PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senateand House of Representatives:

Notwithstanding the early day which had been fixed for your session of the present year, I was induced to call you together still sooner, as well that any inadequacy in the existing provisions for the wants of the Treasury might be supplied, as that no delay might happen in providing for the result of the negotiations on foot with Great Britain, whether it should require arrangements adapted to a return of peace, or further and more effective provisions for prosecuting the war.

That result is not yet known. If, on one hand, the repeal of the Orders in Council, and the general pacification in Europe, which withdrew the occasion on which impressments from American vessels were practised, suggest expectations that peace and amity may be re-established, we were compelled, on the other hand, by the refusal of the British Government to accept the offered mediation of the Emperor of Russia; by the delays in giving effect to its own proposal of a direct negotiation; and, above all, by the principles and manner in which the war is now avowedly carried on, to infer that a spirit of hostility is indulged more violent than ever against the rights and prosperity of this country.

This increased violence is best explained by the two important circumstances, that the great contest in Europe for an equilibrium guaranteeing all its States against the ambition of any, has been closed without any check on the overbearing power of Great Britain on the ocean; and it has left in her hands disposable armaments with which, forgetting the difficulties of a remote war with a free people, and yielding to the intoxication of success, with the example of a great victim to it before her eyes, she cherishes hopes of still further aggrandizing a Power already formidable in its abuses to the tranquillity of the civilized and commercial world.

But, whatever may have inspired the enemy with these more violent purposes, the public councils of a nation, more able to maintain than it was to acquire its independence, and with a devotion to it rendered more ardent by the experience of its blessings, can never deliberate but on the means most effectual for defeating the extravagant views or unwarrantable passions with which alone the war can now be pursued against us.

In the events of the present campaign, the enemy, with all his augmented means, and wanton use of them, has little ground for exultation, unless he can feel it in the success of his recent enterprises against this metropolis and the neighboring town of Alexandria, from both of which his retreats were as precipitate as his attempts were bold and fortunate. In his other incursions on our Atlantic frontier, his progress, often checked and chastised by the martial spirit of the neighboring citizens, has had more effect in distressing individuals, and in dishonoring his arms, than in promoting any object of legitimate warfare. And, in the two instances mentioned, however deeply to be regretted on our part, he will find in his transient success, which interrupted for a moment only the ordinary public business at the Seat of Government, no compensation for the loss of character with the world, by his violations of private property, and by his destruction of public edifices, protected, as monuments of the arts, by the laws of civilized warfare.

On our side, we can appeal to a series of achievements which have given new lustre to the American arms. Besides the brilliant incidents in the minor operations of the campaign, the splendid victories gained on the Canadian side of the Niagara, by the American forces under Major General Brown, and Brigadiers Scott and Gaines, have gained for these heroes, and their emulating companions, the most unfading laurels; and, having triumphantly tested the progressive discipline of the American soldiery, have taught the enemy that the longer he protracts his hostile efforts, the more certain and decisive will be his final discomfiture.

On our southern border, victory has continued also to follow the American standard. The bold and skillful operations of Major General Jackson, conducting troops drawn from the militia of the States least distant, particularly of Tennessee, have subdued the principal tribes of hostile savages, and, by establishing a peace with them, preceded by recent and exemplary chastisement, has best guarded against the mischief of their co-operation with the British enterprises which may be planned against that quarter of our country. Important tribes of Indians on our Northwestern frontier have also acceded to stipulations which bind them to the interests of the United States, and to consider our enemy as theirs also.

In the recent attempt of the enemy on the city of Baltimore, defended by militia and volunteers, aided by a small body of regulars and seamen, he was received with a spirit which produced a rapid retreat to his ships; whilst a concurrent attack by a large fleet was successfully resisted by the steady and well directed fire of the fort and batteries opposed to it.

In another recent attack by a powerful force on our troops at Plattsburg, of which regulars made a part only, the enemy, after a perseverance for many hours, was finally compelled to seek safety in a hasty retreat, with our gallant bands pressing upon him.

On the Lakes, so much contested throughout the war, the great exertions for the command made on our part have been well repaid. On Lake Ontario, our squadron is now, and has been for some time, in a condition to confine that of the enemy to his own port, and to favor the operations of our land forces on that frontier.

A part of the squadron on Lake Erie has been extended into Lake Huron, and has produced the advantage of displaying our command on that lake also. One object of the expedition was the reduction of Mackinaw, which failed, with the loss of a few brave men, among whom was an officer justly distinguished for his gallant exploits. The expedition, ably conducted by both the land and the naval commanders, was otherwise highly valuable in its effects.

On Lake Champlain, where our superiority had for some time been undisputed, the British squadron lately came into action with the American, commanded by Captain Macdonough. It issued in the capture of the whole of the enemy's ships. The best praise for this officer, and his intrepid comrades, is in the likeness of his triumph to the illustrious victory which immortalized another officer, and established, at a critical moment, our command of another lake.

On the ocean, the pride of our naval arms has been amply supported. A second frigate has indeed fallen into the hands of the enemy, but the loss is hidden in the blaze of heroism with which she was defended. Captain Porter, who commanded her, and whose previous career had been distinguished by daring enterprise and by fertility of genius, maintained a sanguinary contest against two ships, one of them superior to his own, and under other severe disadvantages, till humanity tore down the colors which valor had nailed to the mast. This officer and his brave comrades have added much to the rising glory of the American flag, and have merited all the effusions of gratitude which their country is ever ready to bestow on the champions of its rights and of its safety.

Two smaller vessels of war have also become prizes to the enemy; but, by a superiority of force which sufficiently vindicates the reputation of their commanders; whilst two others, one commanded by Captain Warrington, the other by Captain Blakely, have captured British ships of the same class, with a gallantry and good conduct which entitle them and their companions to a just share in the praise of their country.

In spite of the naval force of the enemy accumulated on our coasts, our private cruisers also have not ceased to annoy his commerce, and to bring their rich prizes into our ports; contributing thus, with other proofs, to demonstrate the incompetency and illegality of a blockade, the proclamation of which is made the pretext for vexing and discouraging the commerce of neutral Powers with the United States.

To meet the extended and diversified warfare adopted by the enemy, great bodies of militia have been taken into service for the public defence, and great expenses incurred. That the defence everywhere may be both more convenient and more economical, Congress will see the necessity of immediate measures for filling the ranks of the regular Army, and of enlarging the provision for special corps, mounted and unmounted, to be engaged for longer periods of service than are due from the militia. I earnestly renew, at the same time, a recommendation of such changes in the system of the militia, as, by classing and disciplining for the most prompt and active service the portions most capable of it, will give to that great resource for the public safety all the requisite energy and efficiency.

The moneys received into the Treasury during the nine months ending on the 30th day of June last, amounted to thirty-two millions of dollars, of which near eleven millions were the proceeds of the public revenue, and the remainder derived from loans. The disbursements for public expenditures during the same period exceeded thirty-four millions of dollars, and left in the Treasury, on the first day of July, near five millions of dollars. The demands during the remainder of the present year, already authorized by Congress, and the expenses incident to an extension of the operations of the war, will render it necessary that large sums should be provided to meet them.

From this view of the national affairs, Congress will be urged to take up, without delay, as well the subject of pecuniary supplies as that of military force, and on a scale commensurate with the extent and the character which the war has assumed. It is not to be disguised that the situation of our country calls for its greatest efforts. Our enemy is powerful in men and in money, on the land and on the water. Availing himself of fortuitous advantages, he is aiming, with his undivided force, a deadly blow at our growing prosperity, perhaps at our national existence. He has avowed his purpose of trampling on the usages of civilized warfare, and given earnest of it in the plunder and wanton destruction of private property. In his pride of maritime dominion, and in his thirst of commercial monopoly, he strikes with peculiar animosity at the progress of our navigation and of our manufactures. His barbarous policy has not even spared those monuments of the arts and models of taste with which our country had enriched and embellished its infant metropolis. From such an adversary, hostility, in its greatest force and in its worst forms, may be looked for. The American people will face it with the undaunted spirit which in their Revolutionary struggle defeated his unrighteous projects. His threats and his barbarities, instead of dismay, will kindle in every bosom an indignation not to be extinguished but in the disaster and expulsion of such cruel invaders. In providing the means necessary, the National Legislature will not distrust the heroic and enlightened patriotism of its constituents. They will cheerfully and proudly bear every burden of every kind which the safety and honor of the nation demand. We have seen them everywhere paying their taxes, direct and indirect, with the greatest promptness and alacrity. We see them rushing with enthusiasm to the scenes where danger and duty call. In offering their blood, they give the surest pledge that no other tribute will be withheld.

Having forborne to declare war until to other aggressions had been added the capture of nearly a thousand American vessels, and the impressment of thousands of American seafaring citizens, and until a final declaration had been made by the Government of Great Britain, that her hostile orders against our commerce would not be revoked, but on conditions as impossible as unjust; whilst it was known that these orders would not otherwise cease, but with a war which had lasted nearly twenty years, and which, according to appearances at that time, might last as many more; having manifested, on every occasion, and in every proper mode, a sincere desire to arrest the effusion of blood, and meet our enemy on the ground of justice and reconciliation, our beloved country, in still opposing to his persevering hostility all its energies, with an undiminished disposition towards peace and friendship on honorable terms, must carry with it the good wishes of the impartial world, and the best hopes of support from an omnipotent and kind Providence.

JAMES MADISON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Oct. 1, 1814.

The undersigned, acting as Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate, requesting the President to cause to be laid before the Senate such information in his possession, respecting the existing state of the relations between the United States and the Continental Powers of Europe, as he may deem not improper to be communicated, has the honor to report:

That the relations of the United States with the Continental Powers of Europe continue to be those of peace and amity; nor is there, so far as is known to this Department, reason to believe that an unfavorable change is likely to take place.

Measures have been taken to continue our diplomatic relations with France under the existing Government, and to renew those with Spain, which have been for a time interrupted by the peculiar circumstances of that country. Diplomatic relations are also renewed with the United Provinces of the Low Countries. The new Government has sent an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, who has been received.

With the other Powers of the Continent of Europe, our relations have undergone no change since the last session of Congress.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Captain Thomas Macdonough, the officers, seamen, marines, and infantry serving as marines, on board the United States' squadron on Lake Champlain.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be and the same are hereby presented to Captain Thomas Macdonough, and, through him, to the officers, petty officers, seamen, marines, and infantry serving as marines, attached to the squadron under his command, for the decisive and splendid victory gained on Lake Champlain, on the 11th of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, over a British squadron of superior force.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause gold medals to be struck, emblematical of the action between the two squadrons, and to present them to Captain Macdonough and Captain Robert Henly, and also to Lieutenant Stephen Cassin, in such manner as may be most honorable to them; and that the President be further requested to present a silver medal, with suitable emblems and devices, to each of the commissioned officers of the Navy and Army serving on board; and a sword to each of the Midshipmen and Sailingmasters, who so nobly distinguished themselves in that memorable conflict.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to present a silver medal, with like emblems and devices, to the nearest male relative of Lieutenant Peter Gamble, and of Lieutenant John Stansbury, and to communicate to them the deep regret which Congress feel for the loss of those gallant men, whose names ought to live in the recollection and affection of a grateful country.

Resolved, That — months' pay be allowed, exclusively of the common allowance, to all the petty officers, seamen, marines, and infantry serving as marines, who so gloriously supported the honor of the American flag on that memorable day.

Mr. TAIT also communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, together with copies of documents in relation to the victory obtained by the United States' squadron, under the command of Captain Thomas Macdonough, over that of the enemy, on Lake Champlain; which was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the joint committee on the Library of Congress, reported a joint resolution empowering the committee to contract for the purchase of the library of Mr. Jefferson, late President of the United States, for the use of Congress; and the resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the resolution was read the second time by unanimous consent and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and on motion, by Mr. KING, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

"That they have received, through Mr. Samuel H. Smith, an offer from Mr. Jefferson, late President of the United States, of the whole of his library for Congress, on such terms as they consider highly advantageous to the nation, and worthy the distinguished gentleman who tenders it. But the means placed at the disposal of the committee being very limited, and totally inadequate to the purchase of such a library as that now offered, the committee must have recourse to Congress either to extend their powers, or adopt such other as they may think most proper.

"Should it be the sense of Congress to confide this matter to the committee, they respectfully submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the joint library committee of the two Houses of Congress be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to contract, on their part, for the purchase of the library of Mr. Jefferson, late President of the United States, for the use of both Houses of Congress."

MR. JEFFERSON'S LIBRARY.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, chairman of the joint Library Committee of Congress, communicated a letter from Samuel H. Smith, Esq., enclosing one from Mr. Jefferson, tendering the disposition of his library to Congress; which were read.

Mr. Jefferson's letter is as follows:

MONTICELLO, September 21, 1814.

DEAR SIR: I learn from the newspapers that the Vandalism of our enemy has triumphed at Washington, over science as well as the arts, by the destruction of the public library, with the noble edifice in which it was deposited. Of this transaction, as of that of Copenhagen, the world will entertain but one sentiment. They will see a nation suddenly withdraw from a great war, full armed and full handed, taking advantage of another whom they had recently forced into it, unarmed and unprepared, to indulge themselves in acts of barbarism which do not belong to a civilized age. When Van Tromp destroyed their shipping at Chatham, and De Ruyter rode triumphantly up the Thames, he might, in like manner, by the acknowledgment of their own historians, have forced all their ships up to London bridge, and there have burnt them, the Tower, and city, had these examples been then set. London, when thus menaced, was near a thousand years old; Washington but in its teens.

I presume it will be among the early objects of Congress to recommence their collection. This will be difficult while the war continues, and intercourse with Europe is attended with so much risk. You know my collection, its condition and extent. I have been fifty years making it, and have spared no pains, opportunity or expense, to make it what it now is. While residing in Paris I devoted every afternoon I was disengaged, for a Summer or two, in examining all the principal bookstores, turning over every book with my own hands, and putting by everything which related to America, and, indeed, whatever was rare and valuable in every science; besides this, I had standing orders, during the whole time I was in Europe, in its principal book marts, particularly Amsterdam, Frankfort, Madrid, and London, for such works relating to America as could not be found in Paris. So that in that department, particularly, such a collection was made as probably can never again be effected; because it is hardly probable that the same opportunities, the same time, industry, perseverance, and expense, with some knowledge of the bibliography of the subject, would again happen to be in concurrence. During the same period, and after my return to America, I was led to procure also whatever related to the duties of those in the highest concerns of the nation; so that the collection, which I suppose is of between nine and ten thousand volumes, while it includes what is chiefly valuable in science and literature generally, extends more particularly to whatever belongs to the American statesman; in the diplomatic and parliamentary branches, it is particularly full. It is long since I have been sensible it ought not to continue private property, and had provided that, at my death, Congress should have the refusal of it, at their own price; but the loss they have now incurred makes the present the proper moment for their accommodation, without regard to the small remnant of time and the barren use of my enjoying it. I ask of your friendship, therefore, to make for me the tender of it to the Library Committee of Congress, not knowing myself of whom the committee consists. I enclose you a catalogue, which will enable them to judge of its contents. Nearly the whole are well bound—abundance of them elegantly, and of the choicest editions. They may be valued by the persons named by themselves, and the payment made convenient to the public; it may be, for instance, in such annual instalments as the law of Congress has left at their disposal, or in stock of any of their late loans or any loan they may institute at this session, so as to spare the present calls of our country, and await its days of peace and prosperity. They may enter, nevertheless, into immediate use of it, as eighteen or twenty wagons would place it in Washington in a single trip of a fortnight. I should be willing, indeed, to retain a few of the books to amuse the time I have yet to pass, which might be valued with the rest, but not included in the sum of valuation until they should be restored at my death, which I would cheerfully provide for, so that the whole library, as it stands in the catalogue at this moment, should be theirs, without any garbling. Those I should like to retain would be chiefly classical and mathematical, some few in other branches, and particularly one of the five Encyclopedias in the catalogue; but this, if not acceptable, would not be urged. I must add, that I have not revised the library since I came home to live, so that it is probable some of the books may be missing, except in the chapters of law and divinity, which have been revised, and stand exactly as in the catalogue, which will of course be needed, whether the tender be accepted or not. I do not know that it contains any branch of science which Congress would wish to exclude from their collection. There is in fact no subject to which a member of Congress may not have occasion to refer. But such a wish would not correspond with my views of preventing its dismemberment. My design is either to place it in their hands entire, or preserve it so here. I am engaged in making an alphabetical index of the authors' names, to be annexed to the catalogue, in order to facilitate the finding their works in the catalogue, which I will forward to you as soon as completed. Any agreement you shall be so good as to take the trouble of entering into with the committee, I hereby confirm.

Accept the assurance of my great esteem and respect,
THOMAS JEFFERSON.

MEMORIAL OF STEPHEN GIRARD.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of Stephen Girard, of the city of Philadelphia, stating that he has established a bank upon his own fortune and credit, and for his own exclusive emolument, and that, by the construction given to the act of Congress laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, &c., he is excluded from the privileges enjoyed by other banking companies, and praying relief, for reasons stated at large in the memorial; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. ROBERTS, SMITH, and DAGGETT, were appointed the committee.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, the memorial of Stephen Girard, of the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, merchant and banker, respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialist has established a bank in the city of Philadelphia, upon the foundation of his own individual fortune and credit, and for his own exclusive emolument, and that he is willing most cheerfully to contribute, in common with his fellow-citizens throughout the United States, a full proportion of the taxes which have been imposed for the support of the National Government according to the profits of his occupation and the value of his estate; but a construction has been given to the acts of Congress laying duties on notes of banks, &c., from which great difficulties have occurred and great inequalities daily produced to the disadvantage of his bank, that were not, it is confidently believed, within the contemplation of the Legislature.

That the first section of the act of Congress of the 2d August, 1813, having imposed a stamp duty on notes issued by any banker or bankers, as well as by any banks or companies, either incorporated or not incorporated, it is provided by the second section of the act, "that in respect to any stamp on any of the notes of the banks or companies aforesaid, now established, or which may hereafter be established within the United States, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to agree to an annual composition, in lieu of such stamp duty, with any of the said banks or companies, of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per centum on the amount of the annual dividend made by such banks to their stockholders respectively; that your memorialist, in due season, offered to enter into the said composition, at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per centum on the amount of the annual profit of this bank, deeming the annual profit of an individual banker equivalent, in language and in law, to the annual dividend of a bank established by a corporation or company. That it has been officially declared, however, that the second section of the act of Congress does not authorize a composition with an individual banker, because it speaks only of banks and companies, (not of banker and bankers,) and because it speaks only of dividends (not of profits) made to the stockholders; and that hence an individual banker, acting upon a capital of one million of dollars, and issuing bank notes to the amount of one million of dollars, is subjected to the prompt payment of a duty amounting to \$10,000, while an incorporated bank, or even a private company of two or three bankers, acting upon the same amount of capital and issuing the same amount of bank notes, will only be liable, periodically, to the payment of a duty amounting to \$1,500, upon the customary annual dividend of ten per cent.

That the first section of the act of Congress of the 2d August, 1813, imposes a stamp duty upon any promissory note, or notes, payable either to bearer or order, issued by any banks or companies, or by any banker or bankers; that the eighth section, of the act provided that no banks or companies, which shall not have compounded for the stamp duty, shall issue any bank bill or promissory note, unless upon paper duly stamped and whereon the respective duties shall have been paid; and the twelfth section of the act declares, that all the paper wanted for the purpose of the stamp duty, excepting paper for bank notes, shall be furnished, at the expense of the United States, by the Secretary of the Treasury. That, after the rejection of this offer to enter into a composition for the stamp duty, your memorialist has complied with the directions of the law, and has transmitted to the Commissioner of the Revenue sheets of bank notes in order to be stamped.

That, independent of the great hazard and delay to which your memorialist is exposed by these operations, it is obvious, from the texture and quality of bank paper, that the stamp, as at present impressed on bank notes, must disappear in the course of an extensive circulation, producing some uncertainty in the revenue, and probably great injustice to individuals.

And your memorialist, having submitted these considerations to the wisdom of Congress, respectfully prays, that the act of Congress may be so amended, as to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a composition for the stamp duty, in the case of private bankers as well as in the case of corporations and companies, or so as to render the duty equal in its operations upon every denomination of bankers.

On the question, Will the Senate agree to the proposed amendment? it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Daggott, Dana, Gaillard, German, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Robinson, Thompson, Varnum, and Wharton.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Chace, Condit, Fromentin, Giles, Lacoek, Morrow, Smith, Tate, Taylor, Turner, Walker, and Worthington.

On motion, by Mr. GERMAN, to strike out, section 3, after the word "that," in the first line, to the word "act," inclusive, in the sixth line—on motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, November 15.

Mr. SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Chalmers, jun.," reported it without amendment; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to the third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the publication of the laws of the United States within the Territories of the United States; and, no amendment having been proposed, it was ordered to the third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the Commissioner of the Revenue to cause a clerk in his office to aid him in signing licenses; and no amendment having been proposed, it was ordered to the third reading.

On request, Mr. FROMENTIN had leave to withdraw the motions submitted by him the 7th instant, in relation to the non-compliance with the resolutions passed by the Senate on the 18th March, 1814.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof, for their respective quotas of — thousand militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States, together with the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. GERMAN; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Castille, of the city of New Orleans."

On motion of Mr. FROMENTIN, the bill was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. FROMENTIN, DAGGETT, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the Commissioner of the Revenue to cause a clerk in his office to aid him in signing licenses," was read a third time.

On motion, by Mr. KING, it was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. KING, GILES, and BLEDSOE, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution for furnishing the American Antiquarian Society with a copy of the Journals of Congress, and of the documents published under their order; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

ORGANIZATION OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Navy, containing a system for the better organization of the Department of the Navy of the United States, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th March, 1814. The reading thereof was dispensed with; and it was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs to consider and report thereon.

The report is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 15, 1814.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the Senate, passed on the 18th of March last, directing the Secretary of the Navy to devise and digest a system for the better organization of the Department of the Navy of the United States, I have now the honor to report the following system, with such prefatory observations as appear to me pertinent to the occasion.

It has been affirmed and cannot be denied, that imperfections exist in the civil administration of the Naval Establishment; hence it has been inferred that a radical change of system can alone remedy the evils. Legislative wisdom will readily discriminate between the constituent principles upon which the present establishment is predicated, and has thus far prospered, and the defects which result from the absence of an intelligent, practical, auxiliary agency, qualified to digest, arrange, and enforce a proper system of detailed regulations, calculated to insure the judicious and faithful application of public moneys; a strict accountability in the expenditures of supplies: and a rigid execution of the duties enjoined on all the officers and agents connected with the establishment.

Profusion, waste, and abuse, are the inherent offspring of all extensive public institutions; and, if we occasionally perceive these evils, in some degree, in the Naval Establishment of the United States, we are not thence to infer their absence from similar establishments in other countries, where naval science and experience may be presumed to have provided greater safeguards, and more numerous, skilful, and vigilant agencies.

But regulations, however correct and adequate to the end, become nugatory, or worse, unless the authority and the means are co-extensive, and competent to enforce the execution, or punish the violation thereof. This may account for the non-existence of many wholesome regulations in the civil administration of the Navy of the United States; and for the imperfect execution of those which exist. Breaches of the latter too frequently escape with impunity, from the impossibility of the head of the Department taking cognizance of all the multifarious concerns of the establishment. It is problematical, however, whether the excess may not be more injurious than the deficiency of regulation; in the former case, responsibility may be lost in the maze and mass of detail and multiplied agency, while in the latter, general instruction, and sound discretion, not unfrequently insure greater success and responsibility.

That the duties enjoined, or which may necessarily devolve upon the Secretary of the Navy, particularly during a period of active and diversified hostility, are beyond the powers of any individual to discharge to the best advantage, cannot be doubted; although, by great labor and assiduity, with adequate professional qualifications, he may, possibly, execute the general and most essential branches of duty with tolerable success.

In the progress of reform, while we pay due respect to that system, the establishment of which has attained the greatest celebrity, more, it is believed, from its magnitude and power, than from the excellence of its civil administration, we ought not to lose sight of its palpable and acknowledged defects, nor of those features in our own system, to which, in no trivial degree, the exalted reputation of our infant Navy may be attributed.

That our Navy is not excelled in anything which constitutes efficiency, perfect equipment, and general good qualities, it is believed, will be admitted. That our seamen are better paid, fed, and accommodated, is no less true. That all the imported, and many of the domestic articles of equipment, and of consumption in the service, are exceedingly enhanced; that the wages of mechanical labor is more than double that which is paid by Great Britain; that our expenditure is greatly increased by the interruption to navigable transportation, and the great extent of the local service, is equally obvious. Yet, under all these circumstances, it is demonstrable, that upon a comparison of an equal quantity of tonnage and number of guns and men, or in proportion to the number of men alone, our naval expenditure is considerably less than that for the Navy of Great Britain, in which "one hundred and forty-five thousand men are employed, at an expense of more than twenty millions of pounds sterling, annually."

The local service is, from its scattered, irregular, and irresponsible nature, much more expensive and wasteful than that of the regular Navy; the more perfect organization of which, and responsibility of command, insure a more faithful superintendence and accountability. Hence the current expenditure of the service would be an extravagant criterion by which to estimate that of a regular establishment under a judicious system. The force employed in local service is extended throughout a line of stations from Louisiana to Maine, and from Champlain to Huron, consequently it is so weak as readily to be penetrated, at almost any point on our maritime frontier, by the concentration of a small hostile force; and it is expensive in proportion to its diffusion. Independently of the deleterious nature of this service upon the health and habits of those employed in it, we are, from the present necessity of this system, deprived of the services of a body of officers and seamen, sufficient to man thirteen ships of the-line, such as the Independence, Washington, and Franklin seventy-fours.

When we contemplate the effect which such a force would have when acting in conjunction upon our own coast and waters, or in squadron, pursuing the commercial fleets of the enemy on the ocean, or in the harbors of his colonies, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion, that our waters would be freed from invasion; our coast from blockade; his military and naval resources intercepted to such a degree as to paralyze his efforts on this continent; supersede the necessity of a vast Military Establishment, coextensive with our maritime, Canadian, and Indian frontiers; and our citizens from those harassing, irregular, and inconvenient calls of militia, which the predatory enterprise of the enemy so frequently produce. In short, according to my conceptions, this cheap and efficient national defence should be adopted as soon as circumstances will admit, and cherished by a well digested, energetic, and liberal system, steadily progressing with the population, commerce, and resources of the nation.

The nature, construction, and equipment of the ships which constitute a navy, form the basis of its efficiency, durability, and economy, and the most important branch in the civil administration of its affairs. With a view to the reform and extension of the Naval Establishment of the United States, these objects ought to command the first place in our attention, combined with such an organization of the civil department as shall promise the best results.

The defects in this part of the British system have been the theme of criticism and reprehension for many years past. The most minute, laborious, and able investigation, has, from time to time, taken place, under the direction and scrutiny of the Parliament; yet nothing approximating to radical amendment has been adopted; and the advocates of reform, either from the subtle ramifications of the evil, or the agency of some sinister influence, appear to despair of success.

According to the most intelligent writers, supported by well established facts, the deterioration of the British navy, owing to the injudicious selection and combination of incongruous materials in the construction, and the abortive method of preserving, is very alarming; and the diversity in the form, dimensions, and proportions, not only of the several rates, but of the numerous distinct classes of the same rate, as well in their hulls as in their masts, sails, and equipments, and in a still greater degree in their qualities for combined action, demonstrates the prevalence of caprice and prejudice, instead of science and system. "When Lord Nelson was off Cadiz, with seventeen or eighteen sail-of-the-line, he had no less than seven different classes of seventy-four gun ships, each requiring different masts, sails, yards, &c., so that if one ship was disabled, the others could not supply her with appropriate stores."

The consequences resulting from this defective organization and want of system are strongly illustrated in the fact, related by a recent professional writer of rank and talents, that "out of five hundred and thirty-eight ships, &c., in the British navy, now at sea, there are only sixty-nine which are in reality superior in the discharge of metal or force of blows, but inferior in sailing, to some of the American frigates; and that there are but eighteen which, unless in smooth water, are equal to contend with the United States, leaving four hundred and fifty-one, out of five hundred and thirty-eight, which are admitted to be incompetent to engage, single-handed, with an American frigate."

These facts are encouraging, and serve to show, that although the numerical force of the enemy in ships and men appears to be overwhelming; yet, if the aggregate number of officers, seamen, and marines, which the United States may, even now, engage for the public service, was concentrated in eighteen or twenty ships-of-the-line, such as have been recently built, it would place all the ships alluded to in the quotation just recited, except the eighteen, hors de combat; nor could our enemy protect his commerce and colonies, and combine such a force as would counteract the power and offensive enterprise of an American squadron so truly formidable. With such a force it will be perceived, that his host of frigates and smaller vessels would be struck out of the account, or added to the list of our Navy, if they came in contact. These views, it is true, are prospective, but with a stable, judicious, and liberal system, the result would be realized at no remote period.

Having noticed these exceptions to the civil administration of the British navy, it is but just to observe, that the organization of the military part of their system is much more perfect.

The regulations and instructions for the service at sea, adopted by order in Council, and published in one quarto volume, in 1808, are those which now prevail. They are excellent, and afford much matter worthy of incorporation into our system, with such modification as the peculiar circumstances of the service may require.

Of the French naval system, the Department of Construction is universally admitted to be the most perfect in existence, and is well worthy of imitation. The military part of the system, however, is less perfect in practice, and not so well adapted to the habits and usages of American seamen as that of the British.

The character of the navy of any nation will be determined by its commercial and navigating enterprise. That of America had surpassed every other, until the unexampled prosperity and rapid extension of its commerce, excited the envy, jealousy, and hostility, of those who could not meet it in fair, equal, and friendly competition. The same energy, skill, vigilance, and intrepidity, which distinguished the commercial navigators of the United States, characterize the officers and seamen of the Navy. The same superiority of construction which gave to its commercial marine the celerity and security for which it is distinguished, may be seen in the American Navy, which is truly indigenous and distinct from every other. The independent character of the nation is manifestly visible in the genius of its Navy. The classes of our ships, their form, construction, armament, and equipment, have been tested by experience, and found to have been happily adapted to our circumstances, compelling the enemy either to employ ships-of-the-line against frigates, or to construct a new class of ships. Their efficiency and perfection have extorted the praise of the enemy. The author, before quoted, says: "The caronades I saw on board the United States' brig Argus were better mounted, and the vessel more complete than those in the British navy; and she was uncommonly well manœuvred."

Our ships are excellent, and all in good condition. The classes are few, and so uniform that, without inconvenience, the masts, spars, and equipments, of any one of a class will serve, indifferently, for any other of the same class. All the new ships, of each rate, are of the same class, and are absolutely similar in all their equipments, and in the dimensions and proportions of their hulls, masts, spars, &c. This strict similarity should be carefully preserved, upon every principle of convenience, economy, and efficiency.

Timber, which forms an object of much solicitude in Great Britain, deserves the particular attention of the Department, the reorganization of which will doubtless be made to combine the necessary talents and means to provide for every branch of the service, by a seasonable, diligent, and judicious collection, in secure and convenient depots, of all the materials which enter into the construction and equipment of ships of war.

When it is considered that one seventy-four-gun ship requires two thousand large oak trees, equal to the estimated produce of fifty-seven acres, the importance of securing, for public use, all that valuable species of oak, which is found only on the Southern seaboard, is sufficiently obvious.

Dock yards, foundries, smitheries, and armories, in safe and eligible situations, are indispensable appendages of so important and growing an establishment. These always collect the best workmen, and as private interest cannot interfere with the execution, the materials and workmanship are better, and the work is performed with more certainty and regularity, than by contract with private individuals, whose works, in some cases, may be so remote from the seat of demand, that the transportation may cost more than the article.

There is another branch of the service which appears to me to merit the serious deliberation of the Legislature, with regard to the establishment of some regular system, by which the voluntary enlistments for the Navy may derive occasional reinforcement from the services of those seamen, who, pursuing their own private occupations, are exempt, by their itinerant habits, from public service of any kind. In my view there would be nothing incompatible with the free spirit of our institutions, or with the rights of individuals, if registers, with a particular descriptive record, were kept in the several districts, of all the seamen belonging to the United States, and provision made by law for classing and calling into the public service, in succession, for reasonable stated periods, such portions or classes, as the public service might require, and if any individual, so called, should be absent at the time, the next in succession should perform the tour of duty of the absentee, who should, on his return, be liable to serve his original tour, and his substitute be exempt from his succeeding regular tour of duty.

In the military service, should the ranks not be filled by recruits, the deficiency of regular force may be made up by draughts of militia, to assemble at a given time and place; not so in the naval service, it depends, exclusively, upon voluntary enlistments, upon which there is no reliance for any given object, at any time or place. Hence, the most important expeditions may utterly fail, though every possible exertion shall have been made to carry them into effect.

If we examine, with due attention, the nature, extent, and importance of the objects involved in the administration of naval affairs, and contemplate, in the history of ages past, the unsuccessful, though indefatigable labors of legislation, science, and genius, to perfect the system, we may learn to appreciate with more accuracy, and cherish with liberality, the life of study, observation and experience, required to arrive even at moderate attainments in a science, which, though familiar in the estimation of all, is the most complicated, critical, and interesting, that has ever engaged the attention or influenced the destinies of nations. My sole object is to invite the attention and liberality of the National Councils to the requisite talents and qualifications for the cherishing and rearing to maturity, the vigorous plant, around which are entwined the affections and confidence of the country.

All these objects appear to me to be intimately connected with the revision of the civil administration of our naval affairs, the Executive branch of which should be conducted by persons of enlarged views, collectively combining all the practical knowledge and professional intelligence which these important, diversified, and comprehensive subjects, obviously require.

We have a good foundation upon which to raise a durable superstructure; and concluding that that system cannot be radically wrong, which has produced such favorable results, I should be unwilling to hazard, by an entire innovation, the benefits we have derived, and may still derive, by retaining the present organization of the Navy Department, and providing, by law, for an intelligent, practical, and efficient auxiliary agency, such as experience has suggested.

With this view, I have the honor to submit, with great deference, the following system for the organization of the Department of the Navy of the United States, distinguishing, for the sake of perspicuity, in the form of a bill, those objects which appear to require Legislative provision, from those for which Executive regulation may prescribe with more convenience and advantage; the outline of which only is given, as the ground-work may be filled up to greater benefit, when the collected experience and talents which it contemplates shall have deliberated upon the subject.

An Act for the better organization of the Navy Department.

Be it enacted, &c., That the office, duties, and powers of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the Accountant, Agents, and other officers of the Department of the Navy, be and remain as now, by law, established; except as hereinafter modified, altered, or transferred to any other office or offices, created by this act.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized to designate three officers of the Navy, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint two other judicious persons, skilled in naval affairs, to be Inspectors of the Navy, who together shall constitute a Board of Inspectors of the Navy, three members whereof shall be necessary to form a quorum; and the business of the said board shall be transacted in such central and convenient place, for the superintendence of the affairs of the Navy, as the President of the United States shall direct; who shall also have power to designate the presiding member, and to appoint the secretary of the said board, whose duty it shall be to keep regular and correct records of all the transactions of the board, and to transmit attested copies of all such proceedings to the Secretary of the Navy, for the inspection and revision of the President of the United States, as soon as may be after the adjournment of the meeting at which any such proceedings shall have taken place; and the said board shall have power to establish such rules and regulations, for its own proceedings, and to employ such number of clerks and assistants, as well for the transacting of the business of the board, as for that of the several inspectors, and to procure such books, maps, charts, plans, drawings, models, and stationery as the public interest may require, and the President of the United States approve.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to arrange and class, under distinct and appropriate heads, as equally as may be, all such duties and details as may be found impracticable for the officers of the Department of the Navy, as now organized, to execute with advantage to the public, and, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to assign to each inspector of the Navy the special charge and execution of one of the classes, so arranged; for the faithful performance of which trust, the said inspectors shall severally be held responsible, under the instruction and subject to the revision of the board of inspectors, to which a statement of all the transactions of each inspector shall be submitted for revision, at each stated meeting, and an abstract thereof transmitted monthly to the Secretary of the Navy, with such remarks thereon as the nature of the case may require; and it shall also be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to prepare a system of general regulations, defining and prescribing the respective powers and duties of the board of inspectors of the Navy, and of the several inspectors, which rules, when approved by the President of the United States, shall be respected and obeyed, until altered or revoked by the same authority; and the same general regulations, thus prepared and approved, shall be laid before Congress at their next session.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized alone to appoint a person, skilled in the science and practice of naval architecture, to the office of Naval Constructor; and also to appoint two naval constructors. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to prepare such rules and regulations for connecting the business of the Constructor's department, as shall appear necessary and proper; which, when approved by the President of the United States, shall be respected and obeyed, until revoked by the same authority. And the naval constructor shall be allowed one clerk, to assist in transacting the business of his department.

SEC. 5. That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized, with the consent and advice of the Senate, to appoint a Paymaster of the Navy, who shall perform the duties of his office agreeably to the directions of the President of the United States for the time being; and, before he enters upon the duties of the same, shall give bonds, with good and sufficient sureties, in such sums as the President of the United States shall direct, for the faithful discharge of his said office, and shall take an oath to execute the duties thereof with fidelity.

SEC. 6. That all letters and packets to and from the inspectors and paymaster of the navy, which relate to their official duties, shall be free from postage.

SEC. 7. That each inspector of the navy shall be entitled to the pay and rations of a captain commanding a squadron on separate service, and also to the sum of one thousand two hundred dollars per annum, in lieu of house-rent, fuel, forage, &c.; and the salary of the naval constructor shall be three thousand dollars per annum; each of the assistant constructors, one thousand five hundred dollars per annum; the paymaster of the navy, two thousand dollars per annum; the secretary of the board of inspectors, two thousand dollars per annum; and the clerks and assistants, authorized by this act, shall receive such reasonable compensation for their services as the President of the United States shall direct.

I would also respectfully suggest the expediency of providing by law for the establishment of a Naval Academy, with suitable professors, for the instruction of the officers of the Navy, in those branches of the mathematics and experimental philosophy, and in the science and practice of gunnery, theory of naval architecture, and art of mechanical drawing, which are necessary to the accomplishment of the naval officer.

In order to illustrate the principles and operation of the proposed organization of the Navy Department, the following outline of the powers and duties which it is contemplated to assign to the board of inspectors, and to the several inspectors, is respectfully suggested:

Powers and duties of the Board.

The board shall have the general superintendence and direction of the affairs of the Navy, under the instructions from, and powers delegated by, the President of the United States, and authority over all the officers, agents, and persons, employed under the Navy Department; report to the Secretary of the Navy, from time to time, all such matters and things as may, in the opinion of the board, tend to promote the efficacy and economy of the establishment; and, upon the requisition of the Secretary of the Navy, furnish all the estimates of expenditure which the several branches of the service may require, and such other information and statements as he may deem necessary.

The board shall have the power of making contracts and purchases, either directly or through the navy agents, whose power, in this respect, should be limited to small sums, and to objects, the procuring of which may not admit of delay. In all other cases, the previous sanction, either of the Secretary of the Navy, of the board of inspectors, or of some officers authorized by the board, should be indispensable.

The naval stations within the United States should be designated by convenient boundaries; and an officer of rank, trust, and confidence, should reside in each, who should, under the instructions of the board, superintend and control the affairs of the Navy within his district, and report to the board from time to time.

All requisitions of commanding officers, pursers, and other persons, upon the agents, should be checked, and receive the sanction of the board, or of the resident officer authorized by the board, before they are complied with.

Payments and advances should be made, as heretofore, through the navy agents, (except those for the pay or the Navy;); and the sanction of the Secretary of the Navy, of the board, or of the officers authorized by the board, should precede all payments and advances, except for limited and urgent demands.

The board should establish general regulations for the conduct of its members, in the discharge of the special and important trusts severally assigned to them by the Secretary of the Navy; and should digest and report to the Department distinct regulations for the following objects:

1. Uniform regulations establishing the several classes of ships and vessels in the Navy of the United States; with tables of the dimensions, proportions, number, quantity, quality, nature, and description, of masts, spars, rigging, anchors, cables, armament, and equipments, of all kinds; and of the quantity, quality, and description, of provisions and stores, of every species, for a given period, for each class.

2. Regulations for receiving, preserving, issuing, and strictly accounting for, the expenditure of materials and stores of all kinds, and in every department of the service, within the United States.

3. Regulations for surveying and authenticating the actual state and condition of all the ships and vessels of the Navy, and of all materials and stores, of every species, reported to be decayed, damaged, or defective; and for directing the repair, conversion, sale, or other disposition of the same, as the nature of the case may require.

4. A more perfect system of general regulations for the naval service, at sea and on the Lakes.

5. General regulations for the flotilla or force employed in harbor defence, adapted to the peculiar nature of that service.

6. Uniform regulations for the navy yards, arsenals, and depots of stores and materials.

7. Regulations for the cruising ships and vessels of the Navy, while in port; for the recruiting service; and for the officers of the Navy, while on shore, on duty, or on furlough; in order to ascertain the actual state and local situation of all the officers.

8. A system of detailed regulations for the naval hospitals, and medical department of the Navy within the United States.

9. An entire and new system of regulations for the pursers in the Navy, accurately defining their duties, securing a more strict accountability; limiting their emoluments by a fixed and reasonable standard; and protecting the seamen of the Navy from the undue advantages which may be practised, with impunity, under the present system.

10. Regulations for ascertaining, by examination, the moral character and professional qualifications of all the officers of the Navy, below the grade of a master commandant, classing them in the scale of their several merits; and of the pretensions of those who may be selected for promotion, as well as of the candidates for warrant appointments in the Navy.

All which regulations, when approved by the President of the United States, should be established and obeyed, until revoked by the same authority.

assigned to the several inspectors of the Navy, may be classed as follows:

1st Class. Comprehending the general correspondence of the board, and preparation of all the reports, estimates, and statements, required by the Department; and the communication of such propositions and information to the Secretary of the Navy, as the board may deem interesting, and, also, the general charge and direction of the flotilla service on the New Orleans station.

2d Class. Comprehending the general military correspondence with all the officers of the Navy; the roll of the officers of the Navy, and record of their services, merits, and qualifications, to be kept on the files of the board; orders for courts of inquiry and courts martial, and the preparation of all the documents and statements connected with these objects; also, the general charge and direction of the flotilla service on the Southern station, viz: Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Norfolk.

3d Class. Comprehending the direction of ordnance and transportation; the general superintendence of the foundries, laboratories, armories, and other works connected with the naval ordnance department; and the inspection and proof of arms, ammunition, &c. The direction of the transportation of all persons, stores, and provisions of the Navy, by land and water; and the general charge and direction of the flotilla service in the Patapsco and Delaware, and at New York.

4th Class. Comprehending the victualling and sustenance, including purser's, medical, and hospital stores; also, the general charge and direction of the flotilla service, on all the naval stations, from New York eastward, and on Lake Champlain.

5th Class. Comprehending the supply of hemp, yarns, cordage, sail duck, iron and other metals, anchors, and all other equipments and materials required for the service, except those which are included in the foregoing classes, and in the constructor's department; and, also, the general charge and direction of the service on Lake Ontario, and the upper lakes.

The superintendence and direction of these five classes of objects would be distributed among the five inspectors.

The department of construction, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the board of inspectors, would prepare all the draughts, plans, and instructions, for the building of all the vessels of the Navy; construct the models, and, when approved, direct and superintend, under the control of the board of inspectors, the building and repairing of the ships, vessels, boats, the formation of masts, spars, &c., and the contracting for and procuring all the materials of wood, and of copper, in pigs, bolts, and sheets, necessary for the supply of the Navy; construct from the lines, in the mould loft, all the moulds requisite for moulding and bevelling the timber in the forest, under the direction of skilful persons to be employed by the constructor for that purpose; and superintend the construction of the wharves, ships, workshops, and engines, required in building and repairing ships of war.

It is a copious subject, in which it is difficult to combine brevity with perspicuity.

My aim has been to provide a practical, efficient, and economical system, with as much individual and collective responsibility as may be attainable; and I feel a persuasion that the result would not greatly disappoint the estimate I have formed; the wisdom of the Senate will better appreciate its merits.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

W. JONES.

HON. PRESIDENT OF SENATE.

MILITIA OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof for their respective quotas of — thousand militia for the defence of the frontiers of the United States.

Mr. VARNUM addressed the President as follows: Sir, I am deeply impressed with the importance of the present crisis of our national concerns, and the importance of the adoption of strong and energetic measures, well calculated to meet and repulse the force which the enemy contemplate placing in the field against us. And, sir, no man in this Senate will go further than I shall feel disposed to go to effectuate the object which must be dear to every friend of the nation and the rights of the people, to repulse our enemy in the field, procure a just and equitable adjustment of the differences between the two nations, and produce an honorable peace, provided the measures pursued shall appear to me to be founded in justice and equity.

I am fully aware of the great responsibility which rests on the Government of the United States at the present crisis. The Constitution having confided the defence of the country to the General Government, and clothed it with authority to call upon the physical force of the nation to aid in making such defence, and to draw on the fiscal resources of the country for a revenue sufficient to meet the expenses necessarily incurred in making defence, Congress are at this period most imperiously bound, upon their responsibility, and in discharge of their important duty, to adopt measures commensurate with the exigencies of the nation; and I am fully sensible of the necessity of providing a large and ample military force before the opening of the next campaign. But, sir, the raising such forces should be predicated on ground which cannot fail of bringing it into the field early in the Spring; it ought to be placed on principles the best calculated to do equal justice to all classes of your citizens. In that way alone you will insure the confidence of the people, enlist their feelings, and secure their aid in carrying your system into effect. Surely, sir, these desirable qualities are not to be found in the bill before you.

To endeavor to substantiate the position I have taken on this occasion, I must be permitted to recur to the provisions of the bill. In doing this, it is not my intention to implicate the motives or abilities of the committee who reported the bill, nor of those gentlemen who have supported it on this floor; but the bill being public property, the errors which it contains are fair subjects of animadversion—nor shall I attempt a reply to the fine theoretical arguments which have been made use of in support of the bill; but will endeavor to point out some of its defects, and my ideas of the most practicable remedy for those defects.

SENATE.

Militia of the United States.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

The first section of the bill requires the President of the United States to call upon the Executives of the several States and Territories, for their respective quotas of eighty thousand militia, to serve for two years. It would seem, sir, by this section, that the committee were of opinion, that eighty thousand men in addition to the present Military Establishment, which consists of sixty-two thousand, making in the whole, 142,000, would be necessary for the defence of the United States, at all points, the next campaign. In this opinion of the committee, I do most cordially acquiesce; for, sir, under the existing circumstances of our situation, and the situation of Europe, it is very probable that an imposing force will assail us the next campaign; and I consider it an imperative duty, obligatory on the National Legislature, to do all in their power, to repulse the invasion of the enemy at every point—and to insure this object, I am of opinion, that a reliance upon a less number of men in the field, than that contemplated by the first section of the bill, would be highly impolitic, improper, and calculated to jeopardize the safety of the nation; yet, in some of the subsequent sections of it, we find that instead of realizing the pleasing prospect of seeing an ample force in the field, that the force is to be reduced to an indefinite amount; which contradiction in terms, inconsistency in principle, and uncertainty in effect, cannot fail to produce mortification and chagrin in every breast, entertaining the same impressions on the subject which I do.

The same section of the bill provides for calling out this force for two years, and, in subsequent sections of the bill, it is provided that the men shall be raised by draught, in the last resort. Sir, this mode of draughting men from the militia for two years, I must confess is a novel idea to me, and I do believe it will be so to the nation. I have lived to see draughts from the militia, under a colonial system, when the United States were colonies to Great Britain. I have seen and participated in the raising of men for public service, by draught and otherwise, from the commencement of the Revolutionary war up to the present time, and in no instance, which has come within my knowledge, has there been a draught from the militia, for a longer term than nine months; and generally the terms of service have been much shorter than nine months.

No such unreasonable exercise of power, as I conceive to be contained in this bill, ever was attempted under our former Colonial Governments; notwithstanding such attempts might have been fostered by the Monarchical Government under which we then acted. No such attempt was made during the Revolutionary war, notwithstanding our very existence as a nation much depended upon our placing a competent number of men in the field. No such attempt has been made since the close of the Revolutionary war, until it made its appearance in the bill before you. Sir, let us examine the law passed in 1795, authorizing the President of the United States to call out the militia for the purposes designated by the Constitution. By that law we find, that such was the delicacy of General WASHINGTON, the then President of the United States, whose capacity for judging correctly on a subject of this kind all must acknowledge, and such was the delicacy of Congress upon this subject, at that time, that a positive provision was made in the law, that the militia called out under it should not be held to serve more than three months in any one year; and the provisions of that law, with a view to equal distribution of justice among the individuals comprising the militia, go further, and declare not only that the militia called out shall not be held to serve more than three months in any one year, but that they shall not be held to serve more than in due rotation with every other able-bodied man of the same rank in the battalion to which they belong. Such, sir, was the view taken by General WASHINGTON, and by the Congress of 1795, in regard to the impropriety of calling out the militia for long terms of service.

The principle then adopted has been sacredly adhered to ever since that period, until about the commencement of the present war; at which time provisions were made for detaining the militia to be detached for six months. Thus, sir, we shall find, that from time immemorial, the people of this nation have been in the habit of believing that draughts from the militia were not to be made for a term anything like that named in the bill before you, and that belief has been justly founded on the uniform practice of all the various Governments which have been in operation here, since the first settlement of the country by civilized man. In fact, sir, that draughts from the militia should not exceed the term of nine months, is fully established as a principle of common law, which no one has ever attempted to violate before the introduction of the bill under consideration. And I very much fear, sir, that the violation of the principle which the bill proposes to introduce, will not sit very well on the minds of the people. Surely, sir, this is not a time to introduce new principles which are in any degree calculated to alienate the people, or any part of them, from a vigorous defence of our national rights. I consider this system of draughting militiamen for two years' service, to be unnecessary, unequal, and unjust. If the nation wish for an additional force to the amount, and for the term mentioned in the bill, why not proffer terms adequate to procure it, and make it a part of the regular army? Although I admit, that the General Government have power, by the Constitution under which we act, to call on a part, or all the physical force of the nation for the defence of its rights, when necessary; yet, sir, I contend, that this power ought to be exercised under a sound discretion, calculated, as near as may be, to do equal justice. But this bill presents to my mind a very different aspect. It disregards the system of equality for military services among our citizens, and violates the principle of rotation in regard to those services, which has been held sacred by those who have gone before us, and which I consider imperiously binding upon us.

The second section of the bill provides for classing the whole of the militia, so that each class shall furnish one man by draught or contract for two years.

This mode of classification, I contend, is unequal and unjust, as it includes those only who are enrolled in the militia, and excludes all those who are not enrolled in the militia. The very act of classing the militia, and calling upon each class to furnish one man for two years, clearly demonstrates that the Government is aware that the pay given by the public is not sufficient to bring the men into the field for such length of time. This fact is corroborated by the provision in the first section of the bill which apportion the men to be raised amongst the States and Territories upon the principle of representation and direct taxation. In this principle, distributive justice is properly regarded as it relates to the States and Territories. But, sir, it is entirely abandoned as it relates to the people at large, by your mode of classification.

If the situation of the nation has become such as to make it necessary to class the people for the purpose of procuring an adequate number of soldiers, I conceive that the just and equitable mode of doing it would be to include in your classes all the taxable polls, and all the taxable property by whomsoever possessed—the classes to be so formed as that each class should contain, as near as may be, a just and due proportion of all the taxable polls and property; each individual in a class should be holden to contribute towards procuring a soldier, by contract, in proportion to the taxables he may possess. And in order to insure the raising your men by classing the people, you must provide that each class which does not procure a soldier by contract in a given time, shall be taxed, each individual in proportion to the taxables he may possess, in a sum sufficient, at all events, to raise a man for such class; the assessment on such delinquent class should be collected by a summary process, and the money paid into the hands of a faithful officer, who would not fail to procure the man.

This is a mode of classification similar to the one adopted in the Revolutionary war, which was generally satisfactory. Contrast this system with the one contained in the bill before you, and let every man judge which of them ought to be preferred.

In the one case, all the persons and property in the nation would be called upon to disburse a due proportion of the national expense; and, in the other case, the persons enrolled in the militia only are to bear the expense of raising and getting into the field eighty thousand troops, to serve for two years.

The persons enrolled in the militia are generally composed of farmers, mechanics, and laborers, not very affluent in their circumstances, but as respectable and useful members of society as any class of citizens which can be named. I imagine that they do not hold one-third of the property which is to be defended; and yet, sir, this class of your citizens are to be called upon to bear the whole expense of this extensive detachment, while those who hold two-thirds of the property of the nation, if my ideas upon that subject be correct, are not to be called upon to pay a cent. I can see no reason for this discrimination; I conceive it to be founded in error of so deep a die as to materially impede our operations of defence, if not to defeat them altogether. Pray, sir, what reason can be given why the rich merchant, the wealthy farmer, the opulent professional gentleman, those citizens holding property who are over the age of forty-five years, and all those citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, who have been exempted from militia duty by the laws of the United States, and of individual States, should be exempted from a participation in the extra expense of this draught? I confess I can see none, nor have I heard of but one attempted to be given; that was, that the militia were called on by this bill to render personal service, and not for pecuniary aid. But, sir, that assertion is proved to be fallacious by the bill itself. In the fourth section of the bill it is provided, that, "for the purpose of equalizing as much as possible the contributions of the respective classes, in all cases where any class may furnish a militiaman by contract, it shall be the duty of such militia officer or officers, in laying off the respective districts comprehending each class, to apportion the same, as nearly as possible, according to the value of property and the number of militiamen subject to draught within each company." Here, sir, we find a direct appeal to pecuniary aid, anything which has been said to the contrary notwithstanding. But it is said the alternatives in this second section of the bill ameliorate the severities in the preceding parts of it. What are those alternatives? The first provides, "that if any State or Territory shall, within three months after the passing of this act, furnish its quota of militia, or any part thereof required by this act, or any other troops in lieu thereof, for an equal or longer term of service, the same shall be received into the service of the United States in substitution of the same number of militia called for by this act; and in that case the draught shall so far cease to take effect." I must confess, sir, that this alternative does not, in my view, present such beneficial features, as some gentlemen have imagined were contained in it. It is to be sure a modest appeal to the patriotism of the States and Territories to furnish their quotas of the men to be raised, pretty much of the nature of a recommendation under the old articles of Confederation, when Congress had power to recommend, but none to execute. It gives the States and Territories three months to consider of the question, and consequently suspends the whole operation of raising the men, otherwise than by State or Territorial authority, during that period. Well, sir, let us suppose, which certainly is at least a very possible case, that at the end of three months you find that the States and Territories have not thought proper to furnish the men, what then is to be done? Why, sir, at the time when your men ought to be ready to take the field, you will have to commence raising them by the dilatory and very uncertain modes pointed out by the bill. Your militia must be then classed, and each class is to furnish a man by contract or draught; here again the bill appeals to the patriotism of the classes, and tells them if they will each furnish a man by contract, they will be exempt from the draught. Well, sir, what if the patriotism of the classes should not be sufficiently strong to induce them to procure their man by contract? The only remedy which the bill provides in that case is, for them to resort to the draught. Sir, who is authorized to make this draught? I find, by the second and fourth sections of the bill, that the classes are each imperatively called on to furnish a man for two years, either by draught or contract. I find no militia officer authorized to make the draught, nor any other person except the class itself. Hence, however novel and subversive of all military and militia principles of procedure this provision may appear, I must conclude, that the classes alone are authorized to make the draught.

Will the classes make the draught under the novel and extraordinary provisions of this bill? I imagine they will not, sir. First, because no bounty is offered them for procuring their men by contract; and, secondly, because no penalty whatever is required of them for omitting to raise their men by contract, nor for refusing to make the draught. Sir, I will quit this part of the subject for the present, in order to make some further observations on the details of the bill; but I purpose to touch upon it again before I sit down.

By the third section of the bill, every commanding officer of a company of infantry is called upon to enter upon his muster roll every person subject to militia duty within the beat or district comprehending his company, whether of artillery, cavalry, grenadiers, light infantry, volunteers, or by whatever other denomination distinguished, which muster roll is to be made on oath and returned to the commander of the battalion or regiment to which he belongs, and by such commander to the brigade inspector, and by him to the adjutant general of the State or Territory; whereupon, all the militia of every description entered upon such muster roll shall in like manner be subject to classification, for the purposes of draught or contribution required by the act.

In the first place, sir, I would inquire for what purpose the commanders of companies of infantry are called upon to enrol those of other corps? I know that it has been said, that the other corps being scattered over a more extensive territory, would not so expeditiously be called out by their own officers, as they would be by the provisions of this bill, against which statement I must most peremptorily protest. I have been a long time in the militia, and have had the superintendence of many draughts from it for public service, and I am compelled to assure you, that the officers of these select corps, to their honor be it spoken, have always on such occasions been active, persevering, and prompt, in procuring their men, and quite as early in making their returns as the officers of the infantry, whose commands were much more compact. Besides, sir, I do conceive that you are imposing upon the commanders of infantry companies a duty which does not devolve upon them in virtue of their commissions, the oath they have taken, or the tenure of the office they hold. And, sir, if they should attempt to carry into effect the mandates of this bill, in regard to the members of select corps, I know of no constitutional, legal, or military principle which would enable them to do it. The officers and men composing these select corps, so far as I know, are honorable men, at all times willing to do their duty, and you must conceive, sir, that the degradation imposed upon them by this bill must be very mortifying to them.

That part of the third section which directs the commanders of battalions and regiments to make their returns of enrolments to the brigade inspector, is unmilitary and highly improper. It compels them to make their returns to an officer below them in rank, and that officer is directed to forward the returns to the adjutant general, passing by the brigadier generals and the major generals; officers eminently responsible for the correct performance of duty by all the officers and soldiers under their command, and who always have in their possession documents by which any attempt to commit a fraud can be checked and detected. By the provisions of the bill, you have no check upon fraud except the oaths of the captains of infantry. You require the adjutant general, by the fourth section of the bill, to determine how many men shall compose each class, and to apportion the classes and number of men to be detached from the several brigades, regiments, or battalions. This is a new duty assigned to the adjutant generals, and one which I should imagine they would not be very fond of discharging.

When the adjutant generals have completed the duty assigned them, they are to transmit copies of their doings to the brigadiers, who are charged with a transmittance of such copies to the commanding officers of regiments and battalions, leaving no responsibility for the correct distribution of the men to be draughted on the brigadiers, nor upon the commanders of regiments or battalions; but the commanders of companies are charged with dividing the men into classes, conformably to the number assigned to each class by the adjutant general. Here the militia part of the operation for raising your men ends. The captains are not charged with the duty of even informing the men how they are classed; they are not directed to keep a record of the classification, nor to make return of their doings to any superior officer. The classes are then left to perform all the remaining obligations of raising the men, and that too without being legally informed of whom they consist. Sir, the third and fourth sections of the bill appear to me to be not only destitute of every systematic military principle, but in open hostility to every military procedure heretofore in practice, or which ever can be practised with that degree of precision and certainty which the nature of this case seems to require.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Militia of the United States.

SENATE.

A new path is taken upon ground which I believe was never occupied before, neither in this or any other country, upon a similar occasion. The responsibility of your principal militia officers is dispensed with, and the whole ground appears to me to be enveloped in doubt and uncertainty; whereas it must be acknowledged, that the crisis demands the adoption of the most prompt, expeditious, and certain mode practicable for raising the men and preparing them for the field, and this can only be done by pursuing the correct military system heretofore uniformly practised upon in raising men by draught. Permit me to state it, sir. The President of the United States calls on the Executive of a State (say Massachusetts, if you please) for a due proportion of the men to be raised. The Executive of the State always has before him, deposited in the adjutant general's office, the number of men contained in each division and brigade in the State; the Governor calls on the adjutant general, as one of his staff, to apportion the whole number of men called for among the several divisions, according to their number; for the correctness of the apportionment the Governor holds himself responsible; and, as commander-in-chief of the militia, he issues his general order, containing the apportionment among all the divisions, directing the major generals, or commanders of divisions, to cause the men assigned to their respective divisions to be raised agreeably to the principles of the law under which they are to be raised. The major general apportions the men assigned to his division among the brigades composing the division, according to their numbers, and adds his division orders, directing the brigadiers to cause the men assigned to their respective brigades to be raised in like manner. Each brigadier apportions the men to be raised in his brigade among the regiments and battalions composing the brigade, according to their numbers, and adds his brigade orders, directing the commanding officers of regiments and battalions to cause the men assigned to their respective regiments or battalions to be raised in like manner. Each commanding officer of a regiment or battalion apportions the men assigned to his regiment or battalion among the companies composing such regiment or battalion, according to their numbers, and adds his regimental or battalion orders, directing the captains or commanding officers of companies composing his regiment or battalion to raise the men assigned to them, respectively, in like manner, and to make return to him of their doing therein within a given time, together with the names of the men so raised. All the orders and apportionments, from the Governor down, are transmitted to the commanders of companies, and by them read to their respective companies, and recorded in the orderly book of the company, which is always open to the inspection of any person who may think himself aggrieved by the doings of any superior officer, and for correcting any other error which may be supposed to have been committed in the course of any official transaction of any officer of the line. The officers to command in the detachment are detailed from the division, brigade, and regimental and battalion rosters, according to their rank and standing on the roster for duty, and are all included in the general return.

All these pass through the hands of the several grades of officers which I have named, up to the Governor. The major generals, brigadiers, and commanders of regiments and battalions have their respective staff officers attached to them, whose duty it is to assist in apportioning the men, in copying and distributing the orders, in digesting, arranging, and transmitting returns, and of keeping a fair record of all orders, returns, and of all other official proceedings of the commanders of the said corps in their said capacities; but the commanding officers of corps are responsible for the accuracy of the apportionment, the correctness of the returns, and all other official transactions done and performed by them. I should not have troubled the Senate with these details, had I not been deeply impressed with the idea that the arrangement for raising the men pointed out by the bill is wholly impracticable, and that a better course might and ought to be pursued. The mode of procedure which I have named, I conceive to be founded in strict military principles. It engages the assistance and retains the responsibility which by law is justly imposed upon every officer of the militia, from the Governor to the commander of a company. It secures to you ample means for correcting any error, and for detecting any fraud which may take place in the apportionment, raising the men, or in the returns. It affords means by which the Government can at all times ascertain the exact number of men which they have engaged for the public service, easy and generally well understood.

Sir, in regard to the fifth section of the bill, I will only say, that the organization of the men detached into divisions, brigades, regiments, and companies, would, in my opinion, be more properly vested in the Governors of the States and Territories, than in the President of the United States. The Governors must know better than the President can know, the local situation of the officers detailed and men detached, and consequently are better qualified to organize them to their satisfaction, and in a manner the most useful to the public service.

The sixth section very properly provides for inflicting a penalty on the officers and soldiers who shall fail to obey the orders of a proper officer for carrying into effect any provision of the bill; but this provision must be considered as applying to those officers and soldiers only, who have been detailed or detached, if it be true, that the Government of the United States have no power to inflict punishment on the militia until they are called into the service of the United States, and therefore cannot attach to any of the officers or soldiers of the militia who may not have been detached or detailed.

The seventh section of the bill provides, that the militia to be raised under this bill shall not be compelled to serve beyond the limits of the State or Territory who furnish them, and the limits of an adjoining State or Territory, with the exception of Tennessee, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. Sir, I have always imagined that the United States composed one great family for the purposes of national defence; that if an enemy should invade the State of Maryland, and the forces of the militia of Massachusetts were necessary to repel such invasion, that we were bound to afford our aid, and so vice versa; but, sir, if the Senate are tenacious of retaining the principles of this section, I must submit to their decision.

The eighth section of the bill I consider to be necessary and proper.

In the ninth section of the bill it is provided, that any three classes which will furnish two men for the war, shall be exempt from the militia duty required by the bill. Here I must be permitted, sir, to ask gentlemen if this provision does not come in direct contact with your recruiting service for the war? Your men which you may calculate on recruiting for the war are shrewd, calculating men, and the moment this bill shall be published they will have an eye to the bounty which they may acquire from the classes, in addition to that given by the public; and, sir, will not this retard, if not entirely suspend the recruiting service for the war, until it shall be ascertained what bounty can be obtained from the classes? I apprehend that it will, sir; and if that should prove to be the case, the suspension will be attended with very inconvenient, if not fatal consequences. The bill allows the States or Territories three months to furnish the men in their own way; if not so furnished within that period, it contemplates that, if the classification takes place, the classes are allowed twenty days to procure the man by contract before the draught can take place; then, sir, allowing that the men are to be classed immediately upon the transmission of the bill to the States and Territories, (which I can by no means conceive will be the case,) the recruiting service for the war and the operations of this bill are postponed for at least one hundred and ten days before you commence the operation of law for filling the ranks of the regular army, or for the detachment from the militia provided for by the bill, which will carry you far into April, when in fact the situation of the country requires that the regular army should be filled, and the militia contemplated by this act organized and ready to take the field, before the commencement of the operation of the one or the other system. But, sir, if all the effects contemplated by the friends to this bill, in regard to filling the ranks of the regular army, should be realized, what would be the consequence? Why, sir, instead of the force of 142,000 men, contemplated by the committee as the necessary force with which you ought to open the next campaign, you have 109,000 only; for, sir, taking it for granted, that we have now only 40,000 regular troops in the field, 22,000 is wanting to fill up that establishment; consequently, if 22,000 men should be procured by the classes pointed out in this bill, 33,000 classes would be exempt from the services required by this bill, which would reduce the whole number of men to be brought into the field, as I have stated, to 109,000. The tenth section provides for the supposition contained in it, that more than men enough to fill the regular army may be raised for the war under the provisions of this bill. That I imagine, sir, is a supposition which it is scarcely necessary to provide for; but it is to be remembered, that should the idea be realized, it is calculated to reduce the number of men contemplated for the field the next campaign, to the amount of one-third of the whole number contained in the surplus so raised, and consequently, instead of your having 109,000 men—which I must agree, according to the principles of the first section of the bill, is an adequate number—no man can divine how far below that number your force is to be reduced, by the very uncertain operation of this bill. Sir, while I am upon this part of the subject, permit me again to revert to the third section of the bill, which is, in a considerable degree, connected with it. That section, in violation of the principles of the law of 1795, which I have quoted and which is now in force, and been uniformly practised upon from the passage of the law to this time, subjects all the militiamen who have rendered service in the present war, be it ever so eminent, to the same chance of the draught, as it does, those who have never rendered any service, totally subverting the precious principle of that law which provides for a general rotation of service; and, sir, this vital error in the bill seems to be acknowledged by the same section, inasmuch as it goes on to provide that all former services shall be deducted from the term of service for which they may be draughted under this bill. Well, sir, what becomes of the permanency of the troops to be raised under the bill? Why, sir, it vanishes like a vapor, and leaves no real substance behind. The militiamen which are made subject to this draught, and which have rendered services, are many; probably some of them may have served for two years, and some for eighteen months. And I know, sir, that many of them have served for one year, some for nine, six, and three months. Then you go on to make your organization upon the principles of the bill, your officers are all detailed to command the detachment, according to the principles of the organization. It may appear that some of the men detached have already served for two years; they must immediately be discharged, some must no doubt be discharged in six months, and I know that many must be discharged at the end of one year, at the end of eighteen months, and at the end of twenty-one months. Thus, sir, the permanency of your establishment will be gradually reduced as it relates to the men; but no provision is made for reducing the officers in the same proportion. No, sir, they are to remain in the service, and consequently in the pay of the nation, until the end of the term for which they were detailed, unless the President of the United States should undertake to discharge them, without imputing to them any fault within their power to control, which I should not imagine would be likely to take place. This is the pretended system of permanency in your Military Establishment, reduced by the bill itself to insignificance and uncertainty. Besides, sir, it is provided that the officer making the draught shall make report to the Department of War of all persons draughted by him, who have performed a tour of duty specified in the act. But who is the officer who is to make this return to the Secretary of War? I find no officer designated to make the draught; consequently none can be authorized to make return to the Secretary of War. It must therefore be left with the classes to do it, in which case a correspondence of eighty thousand may be opened, and in all probability of not less than twenty thousand will be opened between the classes and the Secretary of War upon this particular subject, when according to the mode of raising the men which I have had the honor to name, should it be adopted, each captain would be under obligation to make this statement in his return, through the proper channel, to the Governors. The Governors might direct the adjutant generals to make out an abstract of these returns from the captains, and transmit it to the Secretary of War, which would open with him a little over twenty correspondents, instead of at least twenty thousand. And for my own part, sir, I cannot see why the Governors of the States and Territories should not be vested with the authority of deciding this question, without troubling the Secretary of War with it, upon their being responsible for the return being made of their doings to the Secretary of War, for the information of the General Government.

Sir, I have thought it my duty to point out to the Senate my own ideas of what I conceive to be errors, both in principle and detail, contained in the bill. If it should pass the Senate in its present form, I shall very much regret it.

I should be extremely sorry to give my vote against any measure calculated to promote the object of general defence; but, sir, I do not conceive that this bill is calculated to further that object in the most desirable and practicable manner.

I do consider, sir, that the bill commences with unusual and arbitrary principles, never before attempted to be imposed on the militia of this country since its first settlement by civilized man.

It appears to me, sir, as I have endeavored to show, that it contains principles of the most deadly hostility to the correct military principles, now in practice in the militia, for raising men for public service. It dispenses with the responsibility of the principal militia officers in raising men, and thereby leaves the Government at all times in a state of entire uncertainty relative to the number engaged for the service. It is an extremely impolitic measure, inasmuch as it takes new and unexplored ground for its basis, which may, and I presume will, be disgusting to the people, at a time, too, when their most cordial co-operation with the Government is eminently necessary, to enable you to effect the great object which you have in view. In its most prominent features, I conceive that every discerning eye, not a member of this Senate, will, at first view, perceive the most manifest injustice exhibited to individuals of the militia—they are indiscriminately to be subjected to the draught for two years, whatever may be their situation or circumstances in life. Those who have heretofore rendered services have the miserable consolation only, of being told, that their former term of service shall be deducted from the two years, while the honorable principle of rotation, now existing by law, is totally disregarded. And inasmuch as the militia, not possessing more than one-third of the property of the nation, are called on to furnish all the pecuniary means of procuring the men, if procured by contract; and all others, possessing two-thirds of the property of the nation, and not subject to be called on to render personal service, are entirely exonerated from the burdens of this draught.

And, sir, notwithstanding the high, unusual ground which it assumes to take, I must confess that in my opinion it has sown in it the seeds of its own destruction, which are so deep rooted, that I imagine they cannot fail to effect that object. It dispenses with all the responsibility of your principal militia officers, as has been before observed; it inflicts no penalty on the classes for omitting to raise men for the war, for omitting to raise men by contract, nor for omitting to raise them by draught; and as no officer or other person is authorized to make the draught, besides the classes, I consider the whole system as resolving into a recommendation, upon the patriotism of the States and Territories, and upon the patriotism of the classes, which I am apprehensive must fail of furnishing you eighty thousand men. The system, therefore, appears to me to be inefficient, and totally incompetent to effect the object which I am sure the Senate have in view. Mr. President, from the view which I have taken of this subject, I think the Senate must perceive that it is impracticable for me to vote in favor of it in its present shape. Unless it shall undergo a radical change in its principles and details, I must vote against the bill.

Mr. DAGGETT, of Connecticut, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: By this bill, the President is authorized to call upon the several States and Territories for their respective quotas of 80,430 militia, to serve for two years, unless sooner discharged. They are to constitute part of the regular Army of the United States, and to be treated in every respect as such, with the exception that they cannot be compelled to serve beyond the limits of the State or Territory furnishing them, and the limits of an adjoining State or Territory, and that the officers are to be appointed by the State or Territorial authorities. The object of this force is declared to be "the defence of the frontiers of the United States." [The words at the end of the title, "against invasion," were inserted after the bill had passed.]

into the service of the United States, to defend their frontiers and garrison their fortresses for two years, or for any other definite period, or during the war, provided the country is invaded, or in imminent danger of invasion. This country, while engaged in war with any nation which can send either fleets or armies against it, will always be in such condition, and consequently the militia are subject to the control of Congress. There is no limit, say the advocates of this law, to the power of Congress over the militia, in time of war, except that they must be officered by the States. A conscription is thus justified. It is openly avowed by the same gentlemen as proper, just, and legal. I think these conclusions are fairly deduced from the premises. If the power of this Government over the militia is in time of war unlimited, it does indeed follow, that the freemen of this country, who are subject to the duties of militiamen, may be converted into soldiers of the Army of the United States during the war, or for any definite period. The exception that they shall not be obliged to go from the State, or an adjoining State, is a matter of form, and not of right. They may be ordered to Canada, or to any more remote region. But, sir, this whole doctrine is unconstitutional; it is an outrage, upon its face and its principles and provisions, upon the undoubted rights of freemen, and upon the charter of our liberties.

That the powers of this Government are limited—that those not granted are reserved—are positions sanctioned by an amendment to the Constitution, and universally admitted. The entire control over the militia, previous to the adoption of the Constitution, was in the States. All that control, except what has been delegated to the United States, remains. There is no article in the Constitution delegating a general power. Every word employed on the subject shows that it is limited. "Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." Why give power to call forth the militia in those exigencies, if the entire authority over them was elsewhere given? The absurdity is too apparent to admit of argument or illustration. Again: "Congress shall have power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." In other language, it may provide for arranging them into companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions. It may provide that they shall be armed, and the manner in which it shall be done—prescribe the discipline to be pursued, and make laws for governing them while in that service of the United States, to which they might be called forth, in the cases before specified. All this Congress may do, to establish that uniformity and order which are so essential to a well-regulated militia. This is the obvious and just meaning of the clause. Again: "The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States." In these articles of the Constitution, Congress and the President are everywhere limited, and everywhere the power of the States is apparent. The militia cannot be called forth as a regular army at all—they may be called as a militia. They cannot be trained or officered, in any case, except under the authority of the States, nor commanded even by the President, except when called forth in the exigencies specified. Who can discover in these provisions a pretence for asserting that the militia are constitutionally subjected to the general control of Congress?

But, sir, to prove the constitutionality of this bill, its friends rely on those clauses which give to Congress the right "to raise and support armies" and "to provide for calling forth the militia in the cases mentioned." These are distinct and independent powers and are always so considered. If the first gave to Congress any authority over the militia as such, it gave a general authority, and if so, the subsequent provisions regarding them, are worse than useless—they tend only to perplex and bewilder. The truth is, this clause has no reference to the militia any more than to physicians, lawyers, or merchants. It authorizes Congress to raise and support armies, in a manner and by means consistent with the great principles of civil liberty, known to the people of this country, and adopted and deemed sacred in all free Governments. But it is utterly inconsistent with those principles to compel any man to become a soldier for life, during a war, or for any fixed time. In Great Britain, a warlike nation, a nation often the theme of reproach here for the tyranny of the Government, no such practice is, or can be, resorted to; the people would revolt at it; they would shake a throne which should attempt it. It is alike odious here, and I hope it will remain so.

It is said, however, that the nation is invaded; a case of invasion—a specified case exists, and, by the second mentioned power, the militia may be called forth. It is true the militia may be called forth to "repel invasions." It cannot escape observation, that the words employed by the Constitution, "to repel invasions," seem quite unlike the words in this bill, "for the defence of the frontiers," still less are they descriptive of the object for which the gentlemen are obliged to contend the militia may be called forth. They declare that so long as there is invasion or imminent danger of invasion, and this will be our condition during the existence of the war, the militia may be converted into an army for the defence of the country, and support the war. Why did not the great, wise, and good men, as they are justly characterized by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) use language expressive of such an idea? Why did they not say, that in time of war, Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to support it?

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Militia of the United States.

SENATE.

Again, sir, the militia may be called forth to repel invasions, to execute the laws of the Union, and to suppress insurrections. These occasions are, with good reasons, joined. In their nature, upon the soundest and fairest definitions, they are emergencies, sudden and unexpected, and therefore incapable of being met by a regular army. The wisdom of the Convention dictated provision in case of such occurrences. To make such provision by a standing army, always to be dreaded, and the subject of unceasing reprobation by the people of the United States, would have been unwise and impracticable. These were the views of the venerable men who formed and adopted the Constitution. It never entered their minds, that in providing to repel invasions and suppress insurrections, and to execute the laws, they were furnishing the nation with the means of sustaining a war, especially an offensive war. In this light was the subject considered in the State conventions, and had the doctrines here advanced been deemed the legitimate interpretations of that Constitution, it would have been rejected by every State in the Union.

Again, sir, did the Convention intend to give to Congress the power of converting the militia into an army, and yet reserve to the States the power of appointing the officers? It is unquestionable that neither the President nor Congress can grant a commission. You have then an army without the power of giving to it officers, an army which may be kept together, or disbanded for the defect of officers, at the pleasure of eighteen sovereign States. With such an army, you might repel an invasion, or suppress insurrections, or cause the laws to be executed, but you cannot carry on a war.

This bill is not only unconstitutional, but it is unequal, unjust, and oppressive. By the second section, the militia are to be divided into classes, and each class is compelled to furnish a man, one of their number, or a substitute, to serve as a soldier for two years. It affects no citizen who is over forty-five years of age—no exempt from military duty, no commissioned officer, except such as the State shall select to command, and those it obliges to serve, in all events; it includes apprentices, poor men, and those of every occupation, between eighteen and forty-five years of age. To illustrate these ideas, I will ask the attention of the Senate to its operation upon the State of Connecticut. The quota of that State is about three thousand and ten. Its militia consists of about twenty thousand non-commissioned officers and privates; there are not less than forty-eight thousand males above eighteen, and under forty-five; add to these the males over forty-five, and it will be seen what proportion of the male population over eighteen is subjected to this draught. Of the property, I believe, five-sixths, or more, is possessed by the exempts. In these twenty thousand militia are to be found apprentices, day laborers, mechanics, and farmers. Of these, one in seven is, by this bill, forced into the army for two years, or the seven are compelled to procure a substitute. The soldier is allowed no bounty, either in land or money. He is to receive his clothing, subsistence, and eight dollars per month; not more than half the sum to be obtained by laboring peacefully in the ordinary occupations at home. It will be readily seen, that while the United State give a bounty of three hundred and twenty acres of land, as is established in the bill which has just passed the Senate, and one hundred and twenty-four dollars in money, no substitute can be obtained for less than two hundred and fifty or three hundred dollars. Seven of the militia, in this view of the subject, are compelled to pay from thirty to forty dollars each, or one of their number is to become a soldier for two years, while the wealthy exempt is no otherwise affected than he is obliged, with them, to bear his proportion of public taxes; and thus on twenty thousand, of the least affluent part of the community, a burden is imposed of about $75,000. The officer, also, who is appointed by the authority of the State, and detailed to this service, is not at liberty to procure a substitute; he must become an inmate of a camp for two years. Thus the apprentice may be forced away from his work-shop, for a period which will affect his whole future life, the poor man must leave his family helpless, the young farmer or mechanic relinquish his business, to be neglected or ruined, or pay an enormous tax, and the officer, be his condition what it may, is to spend two years in an army, subject to the rules and articles of war. Is this equality? Is this justice? Is it not oppression and tyranny of no ordinary character? If any position be so true as to admit of no doubt, it is, that, in support of burdens created by war, the people should be taxed according to their property. This bill is a palpable departure from that rule of political justice.

It is said, however, that our country is in great peril; men must be had, the Army must be filled. What then? Are these reasons for resorting to unconstitutional and oppressive measures? The plea of necessity is too old, too well characterized, too well understood to be admitted. This people have seen times of imminent danger. In the war of the Revolution where destruction assailed us on all sides, when did we, for a moment, admit these doctrines! The people were, in some States, classed and draughted, but for only short periods, and upon principles totally dissimilar to those contained in this bill. Every man was included and obliged to contribute. In Great Britain, whence we derive many of our maxims, usages, and laws, and whence too we have derived the law for calling forth the militia in the cases specified, every poor man with one child or more, all apprentices, and many others, are exempted from liability to be called out to repel invasions. Are we less attentive to the rights and interests of the people, than the nation towards which so much invective is constantly uttered?

The bill is incapable of being executed, as well as unconstitutional and unjust. It proceeds entirely upon the idea that the State governments will lend their aid to carry it into effect. If they refuse, it becomes inoperative. Now, sir, will the Executives who believe it a violation of the Constitution, assist in its execution? I tell you they will not. No one denies that the State governments have some power over their militia; all admit that they have, at least, a power concurrent with that of the United States. It is so admitted in this debate; the limits, however, it is said, are not, and cannot be denied. Of one thing you may be certain, that the captain general and commander-in-chief of the military force of a State, will not readily yield the whole or any portion of that force to the United States, to become a part of a regular army, and thus consent to annihilate the power of the State over its militia. For such a claim you must show him a warrant in the Constitution. If you differ with him as to the interpretation of that instrument, he is at liberty to construe it for himself; yours is a limited authority over the subject, the general authority is in the State. He is bound to maintain its lawful rights and privileges. He would be unworthy of his station if he surrendered them. It would be a flagrant violation of duty to execute an order which he deemed repugnant to the Constitution.

We are told, however, by the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) that this bill will be popular. Let me assure that gentleman he is mistaken; in New England it will be viewed with extreme horror. An opinion there prevails, is engraven on every heart, it will live, you cannot destroy it, that no freeman is to be made a soldier in your army by compulsion. It is abhorrent to all the enlightened and independent people, of all parties and sects. They too well know and too highly appreciate the privileges of freemen to approve a conscription, however disguised.

Once more: Massachusetts and Connecticut have peculiar reasons for withholding their assent to laws, for calling out their militia. Those already draughted into your service, have neither been subsisted nor paid by the United States. I will speak particularly of Connecticut. On the first of July last, the President requested of the Executive of that State to furnish three hundred thousand men, with a major general and other officers, as its proportion of ninety-three thousand militia required from the several States and Territories. The quota was detached and organized. On the first of August following, Brigadier General Cushing, of the Army of the United States, commanding at New London, requested of the Executive the major part of the detachment thus organized, and that they might be under a brigadier general, and subjected to his (General Cushing's) command. As there was then in the service of the United States, of the militia, more than a brigadier's command, and as a majority of the major general's command was now called for, the major general was, with manifest propriety, directed to accompany his men, and of course it became his duty to command. General Cushing, commanding in that district, (how, and by what authority established as a military district is not now the subject of inquiry,) refused to acknowledge the militia as in the service of the United States, or to pay or subsist them, assigning as a reason, that a major general could not be recognised when any number less than four thousand is required; though, on the first of July, as before stated, three thousand with a major general had been called for and detached, and though the brigadier assigning this reason had not then men sufficient to constitute a colonel's command. This course was in obedience to the orders of the Secretary of War. The militia however, did not abandon the defence of the State and nation, but remained in obedience to the orders of the enlightened and patriotic Chief Magistrate of that State, and have been subsisted and paid out of its treasury. I will not consent to any bill like that on your table, till justice shall have been done to a State which has ever been among the first to perform all her Constitutional engagements.

I shall vote against this bill on another ground. It is declared to be its object, to relieve the regular Army from the defence of the frontiers, that it may be employed in the conquest of the Canadas. I doubt if this object can be effected without first securing the command of the St. Lawrence. Our success as yet is not very flattering. Without detracting from the hard-earned fame of our Army, or the brilliant achievements of our Navy on the Lakes, that country remains entirely in full possession of the enemy. After an immense loss of money and life, the great work is yet undone.

The project, in my judgment, is inexpedient if practicable. The result would not be worth the sacrifice—it would not contribute towards a peace, an object near the heart of every good man. Great Britain is pronounced by gentlemen to be a wise, powerful, and haughty nation. True, sir, and when has she been driven into terms of peace by the invasion of one of her provinces? Should we succeed in this attempt, would her pride be so far subdued as to lessen her demands? Is it not far more probable that such an event might induce her to lay in wide and dreadful destruction an invaluable seacoast? At such a price the Canadas would be purchased at too great a sacrifice. She retaliates by no strict rules. It is not with her, "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth;" but a head for an eye, a body for a tooth. The Parliament House at Little York was destroyed, and she burnt your Capitol.

We are solemnly warned of our danger by the friends of this measure, and asked, if we shall stand still and suffer our country to be desolated? We answer, no; raise armies if you please, to any extent, by equal and Constitutional methods—arm every stick of timber that can float. Let the Navy, once despised, give new proofs, if possible, of her skill and valor; strike home at the commerce of the enemy. This is our true course. This will be felt by the merchant and manufacturer, and their voices will be heard and regarded in the British cabinet. This is the only effectual warfare which we can maintain offensively against that nation. I fear not the conquest of our territory. The attempt would be idle. Invasion will be met and resisted at the water's edge, with success, by hundreds of thousands of Americans who will not be forced into your Army.

MR. MASON, of New Hampshire, addressed the Chair as follows :

Mr. President: I am glad, sir, that the few observations, which I made on a former day, when this bill was under consideration, have induced the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, (Mr. GILES,) to make such an ample exposition of the views and objects of that committee, and of the Administration. I deem it fortunate that, at the commencement of the discussion of the bills on military affairs, we are possessed of the ulterior intentions and designs.

The Secretary of War, in his late report, has recommended for adoption by the Legislature, a plan of a forcible draught, or conscription, of the whole free male population of the United States, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, for the purpose of recruiting the regular Army. He proposes that all persons, within those ages, be formed into classes of one hundred each; and that if any class neglect to furnish four soldiers for the Army, to be delivered over to the recruiting officer within thirty days, that number be taken out of the class by force; that vacancies by casualty, be supplied in like manner from the class, and that the legal bounty of one hundred and twenty-four dollars to each recruit be assessed on all the taxable property within the precinct of each class. This plan must be presumed to have the approbation of the Administration; for it cannot be supposed the Secretary of War would adventure on a measure so important, without such support and countenance.

Although the present bill certainly does not adopt the plan of the Secretary in its full extent, and although the honorable chairman has said he can support the provisions of the bill without its aid, yet he has attempted, in a formal argument, to maintain, that this Government has the Constitutional power, to be exercised at discretion as occasion may require, of placing our citizens, by force, and for an unlimited time, in the ranks of the regular Army. Till lately, such an opinion was entertained by few, if any. I believe it was expressed by none. Great and sudden changes in opinion on important political subjects are the usual forerunners of revolutions in States. This is emphatically the case, where the force of Government rests on common sentiment. Sincerely believing the doctrine contended for, to be unwarranted by the Constitution, and pregnant with consequences dangerous to the rights and liberties of the country, I cannot permit it to pass without attempting its refutation. The most monstrous opinions, when announced by high authority, and supported with plausibility, will, if permitted without contradiction to become familiar to the mind, in time lose much of their original deformity.

The honorable gentleman has been pleased, in a style somewhat monitory, to caution those opposed to his doctrine to consider the responsibility they must encounter in obstructing the measures of Government in the present state of affairs. I admit the distress of the nation exists to the full extent stated. We see and feel it, and have too much reason to believe it will soon become universal. The crisis demands all the wisdom and virtue of the country. I hold a stake in the fate of the nation in common with my fellow citizens, and do not feel inclined to shrink from doing what I think my duty requires. In times like these, no political situation is free from responsibility.

In return, I take the liberty of admonishing the friends of the Administration (and the honorable gentleman, if he includes himself in that number) to be cautious how they attempt to overleap the limits of the Constitution. Of all our dangers, I see none more alarming than the apparent disposition to exercise arbitrary power. Revolutionary measures can never, with safety, be resorted to by a regular Government. They place the magistrate and private citizen on the same level, and none can foresee into whose hands, during the boisterous commotion of the political elements, the tyrant's power will fall. A Government which should require such expedients would not be worth preserving. If sufficient powers are not granted by the people, apply to the people for their enlargement. In periods of alarm and terror, when present danger hushes all fears of that which is more remote and less obvious, inroads on the rights of the people are chiefly to be apprehended. In a case so deeply affecting the personal liberty of the whole body of the nation as the present, no extremity of danger would justify the exercise of illegal authority.

The inquiry is, whether the Constitution gives to this Government the power contended for?

The clause in the Constitution which declares that Congress shall provide for the common defence, has been cited, though very little reliance appears to be placed on it. The purpose of that clause seems to have been to impose a duty, or define an object to the attainment of which the powers granted are to be applied. The words, with others immediately connected, are, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The means or powers are afterwards prescribed, by which these great objects are to be attained. It has not been, and I trust will not be contended, that Congress is at liberty to resort to other means at their discretion. Should this be considered a grant of power, still the subsequent specification of the manner of exercising it, would limit and restrict it. Money raised to pay the debts of the United States, for instance, must be raised in the manner specially pointed out; and if it could not be obtained by taxes levied according to the Constitution, or by other methods therein directed, surely Congress could not levy taxes in any other way, or resort to other means not thereby authorized.

The authority given to Congress "to raise and support armies," comprises their whole power on this subject. This, and the authority of calling forth the militia under certain circumstances, are the means by which the common defence is to be provided for. Can the Legislature, by virtue of this grant of power, adopt the proposed plan of conscription, and place, by force, such part of the population of the United States, and for such periods as shall be deemed expedient, in the ranks of the regular Army? A power so transcendent and dangerous, must, to justify the exercise of it, be derived from plain principles, and depend on no doubtful construction or subtle reasoning.

The power to raise and support armies must be construed according to the intentions and understanding of the people of the United States, who made the Constitution, consistently with all the well known and established rights of the States and of the people—and consistently with the general principles of civil liberty.

The military power or force given by the Constitution to this Government, is of two sorts—a regular Army, and the militia of the States—the latter in certain emergencies, and with certain restrictions and limitations—the former without any restriction. It is unnecessary, for the present purpose, to point out with exact precision all the restrictions and limitations of the power over the militia. In three specified cases only, and for a service within the limits of the United States, and under the command of their own State officers, and as I think, for short periods of service, can this Government call on the States for their militia. From these restrictions, it is apparent, the power of the United States is of a very limited nature, and that the States still retain by far the greatest portion of authority over their own militia. Over the regular Army, the Government of the United States have an unlimited power. They may use it in all cases where military force is needed, in any part of the world, under such officers and for such periods as they please. There always have been in this country important distinctions between the militia and regular Army. These distinctions were always kept up, and in various instances exemplified in the war of the Revolution, and were well understood by the people of the United States at the time of forming the Constitution. There was known to be an essential difference between serving in the regular Army and performing a tour of duty in the militia. Regular armies were raised by enlistment of such as voluntarily consented to enter them. Such, for ages, had been the practice of the British Government, from which we originally derived most of our ideas on subjects of Government; and such was the practice of the Government of the United States, and of the several States during the Revolutionary war. There always has been, and I hope always will be, a jealousy of standing armies. At the time of the Revolution it was carried to an unreasonable height, and too strongly felt. When the Constitution was adopted, no power granted to the General Government was more severely criticised, than that over the military force of the country. Those opposed to the Constitution contended, that the power of the purse and of the sword were improperly united, and that not only the rights of the State Governments, but the freedom of the people would be endangered. If any such power as that contended for, could have been conceived to be granted by the Constitution, it would have been detected and pointed out by those so much alarmed. Yet it is believed, that such construction was not even suggested in any of the conventions, although the subject was there most ably discussed. Nor is it believed, that with this construction, the Constitution would have been adopted by a single State of the Union. If, then, voluntary enlistment was the only method by which a regular Army could be raised, according to the general opinion of the people, it follows that the power to raise armies is, by the very terms used in the Constitution, restricted to that method; for the words must be construed, as they were understood by the people who adopted the Constitution. And so the position of the honorable gentleman, that the grant of power to raise armies being general, and without any restriction of the method by which it shall be exercised, leaves the Government at liberty to adopt any method they please, is ill founded. That might be a just construction of the terms when used by a people accustomed to a despotic government, for they might so understand them.

The power claimed is, doubtless, vastly greater and more dangerous, than any other possessed by the Government. It subjects the personal freedom of every citizen, in comparison with which the rights of property are insignificant, to arbitrary discretion. Had there been an intention of granting such power, would there not have been some attempt to guard against the unjust and oppressive exercise of it, as was done in the granting of powers of less importance? Yet, this power of raising armies, unless confined to voluntary enlistment, is without any guard or restriction whatever. The exercise of it must depend wholly on arbitrary discretion.

All the recruits wanted for the Army might, if the Government should so please, be taken from one section of the Union. The power of raising money is not thus submitted to the discretion of the Government. All taxes, if indirect, must be uniform throughout the United States; if direct, they must be apportioned according to representation. No tax can be laid on exports. Why these guards where property was to be taken, and none where the owners of the property were to be taken? From the mere neglect of attempting in some way to limit the power, it may be strongly inferred that it was not intended to be granted.

Were the Government at liberty to raise armies, by forcibly taking men at its discretion, it might, by a similar construction of the Constitution, support them, by taking property in like manner. The armies, when raised, might live at free quarters, on the people. In a similar way, a navy might be provided, by seizing the ships of individuals. The right in both cases is the same; the injury and distress in taking property the least.

Has the Government a similar power to impress men for the Navy? The terms in the Constitution "to provide and maintain a Navy" are, at least, as proper for this construction, as those applied to the Army. The convenience and necessity in this instance, stronger than in the other. The British Government, before the Revolution, did attempt to exercise in this country the supposed right of impressment for the Navy, which it never did for the Army. Stronger reasons might be adduced for this method of manning the Navy, than for filling the Army. Yet the Government, in their instructions to our Envoys for treating of peace with Great Britain, say "impressment is not an American practice, but is utterly repugnant to our Constitution and laws." The honorable Secretary, when he draughted those instructions, knew not how soon he should be directed to contend for the contrary doctrine.

The power in question is inconsistent with certain well-known rights of the States recognised by the Constitution. Such a construction of a power granted to the General Government as destroys rights reserved to the States by the Constitution cannot be admitted. Because it can never be presumed that rights were intended to be surrendered, which are expressly reserved or recognised as existing in the States. The same principle applies to all rights acknowledged to belong to the States, whether recognised by the Constitution or not. The Constitution declares "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

The States still retaining the principal power over the militia, as has been shown, the power given this Government to raise armies must not be so construed as will destroy that power of the States. The power claimed is to take by force, for the regular Army, all persons capable of bearing arms, including the whole militia of the States. This surely annihilates all State power over their militia. The whole or any part may, at the pleasure of this Government, be converted into a regular army, and the provision of the Constitution in this particular, together with the rights of the States, be destroyed.

The right of the States, in time of war, to maintain regular troops, is recognised by the Constitution. Abandoned by the United States, it is well known that several of the States at the present time, keep considerable bodies of troops for their necessary defence. All these come within the description of persons claimed by this Government, and may be thus immediately transferred to the Army of the United States. Wretched would be the condition of such States, if this Government possessed the power contended for. Unprotected by the General Government, and deprived not only of their militia, but of the troops raised at their own expense, their sole remaining resource would be an application to the mercy of the enemy. It is impossible that these rights, thus secured to the States by the Constitution itself, should be destroyed by a power granted by the same instrument to the United States. The power of the United States to raise armies, if restricted to voluntary enlistment, is consistent with the rights and safety of the States. Any other construction presents conflicting rights which cannot be reconciled.

It has been contended that every well constituted Government has a right to the personal services of its citizens or subjects, which it may enforce by compelling as many as its occasions require to become soldiers; and that the Government of the United States, in common with others, may have this power without any special grant in the Constitution. It is unnecessary to examine the general position, though it is believed it would by no means be found so universal as stated. This Government has no powers except what are delegated. To this particular, the article of the Constitution which has been recited is express. All powers not delegated, are reserved to the States or people. If, therefore, this power exists in our country, it rests in the State Governments, and not in that of the United States. Without resorting to this principle of inherent power, most of the State Governments possess very ample authority to call for the military services of their citizens, in the provisions of their respective constitutions. Hence might be drawn an additional argument, were it necessary, against the present claim of power in the General Government.

The Secretary of War admits, that the men cannot be taken from the militia as militiamen, by reason of the Constitutional restriction, but he says the same individuals may well be taken, in their capacity of citizens. This argument the honorable gentleman from Virginia has not seen fit to adopt. With all proper deference for the respectable authority whence it originates, I must confess my inability to comprehend its force. It would seem, that an individual, to be secure in his personal liberty, must produce a Constitutional protection for himself in each of his various capacities or relations in society. Will it afford much consolation to the miserable recruit, when driven in chains to the Army, to be told that he is taken, in his capacity as a citizen, and not as a militiaman? A prudent Government, at least, would be cautious not to insult the understanding of the nation, when attempting to outrage its rights.

To that part of the Secretary's plan, which recommends a tax to be levied on all property within the precinct of the class, in order to raise the bounty for the recruits, objections occur which, in ordinary times, would seem insurmountable. The provision of the Constitution that direct taxes (of which sort that on land is) shall be apportioned among the States, according to representation, is wholly disregarded. This tax is to be apportioned according to the free male population, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years. This relieves the slaveholding States from the increased tax which they are bound by the Constitution to pay, for their increased representation on account of their slaves. The difference between the sums to be paid by Virginia and Massachusetts, according to the proposed plan, and the Constitutional apportionment, exceeds four hundred thousand dollars. This is a violation of the Constitution too plain and obvious to require any reasoning to demonstrate. It is, however, in my opinion of less importance than the other which affects the rights of personal liberty, as this does the rights of property. Reduce the people to slavery, and you may take their property when and as you please.

The honorable Secretary says, in relation to this part of his plan, "should it appear that this mode of raising recruits was justly objectionable, on account of the tax on property, from the difficulties which may be apprehended in the execution, or from other causes, it may be advisable to decline the tax." But why is a project, directly and plainly violating the Constitution, brought forward at all? Is it to try the temper of the Legislature and of the people, and to lessen the horror at first excited by such attempts by rendering them familiar? In my opinion this system of military conscription, thus recommended by the Secretary of War, is not only inconsistent with the provisions and spirit of the Constitution, but also with all the principles of civil liberty. In atrocity it exceeds that adopted by the late Emperor of France, for the subjugation of Europe, which, after drenching a great portion of that Continent with blood, was destroyed by the most powerful confederacy of nations the world ever knew. He allowed exemptions to fathers of families, and those in certain professions and official stations. But the proposed system exempts none, except the President of the United States, and the Governors of States. All within the prescribed ages, whatever may be their pursuits or condition of life, must submit to the iron yoke; priests must be taken from the altar, and judges from the bench. The highest officers, both civil and military, must be ignominiously forced into the ranks of the Army. The seminaries of learning are to be robbed of their professors and scholars. Neither literature nor science, except what is subservient to the military art, will be held in estimation. The country will become military, and be involved in perpetual wars, often waged to gratify the ambition of rulers. History evinces that wars of ambition are not less the pests of republics than of monarchies.

Such a measure cannot, it ought not to be submitted to. If it could in no other way be averted, I not only believe but I hope, it would be resisted. The most odious and cruel slavery would be the inevitable consequence of submission.

On a former day, when this measure recommended by the Secretary of War, was mentioned by an honorable member, who in his place expressed his approbation (except so far as relates to the bounty tax) in terms not doubtful, I did not hesitate to give it my most decided disapprobation. I then called it weak, violent, and wicked. On more reflection, I see no reason to alter my opinion of its character. It is weak, for it is ill calculated to effect its object; violent, for it attempts to use force, without right; and wicked, for, if successful, it will destroy the Constitution and liberties of the country.

The honorable gentleman (Mr. GILES) has been pleased to understand those epithets as being applied to the Administration themselves; and to express his regret that they had been used. He seems to admit, however, the truth and justice of the two first, and denies only the last. He believes the Administration, though weak and violent, are honest and patriotic. I shall spare myself the labor of discussing that point. It is difficult to ascertain with certainty the motives of statesmen, and it matters little to the country, whether its rights and liberties are lost through the weakness, or wickedness, of its rulers. Public men are to be judged by their measures. The mere attempt to carry a measure, involving such principles, is just cause of alarm. The people can never feel safe while they know the Government claims such a power, which may gradually, as opportunity shall favor, be brought into exercise. The present bill adopts it, in a small degree; another reported by the same committee, authorizing forcible draughts from the militia, to serve for the term of two years, goes much further, with the same principle. In the mean time, among men of desperate fortunes and unprincipled ambition, the doctrine will gain friends. Honest intention and well-meaning weakness give no security, but increase the danger. They prevent alarm, and when men of such a character shall have prepared the system for operation, others of more talents and different character will drive them from their seats, and grasp the despotic power so unsuitable for weak hands. If this proposal of the Executive, though at present, it should not be adopted by the Legislature in all its most odious features, should still be treated with good natured civility, it will hereafter, at some unpropitious moment, be again urged, and perhaps with fatal success. The attempt merits from the nation, deep and full toned expressions of indignation.

After laboring to establish the right of the Government to exercise the dangerous power mentioned, the honorable gentleman (Mr. GILES) has attempted to show that the present bill does not necessarily involve that power. It is certain the bill does not follow the plan of the Secretary of War in its details, but I much doubt whether the provision authorizing the enlistment of minors without the consent of their parents, guardians, or masters, can be justified, without asserting the right to take the citizens for the Army by force. If the Government has not the right of taking persons for the Army by force, they must obtain them by voluntary enlistment. That is, they must contract with individuals to become soldiers of the regular Army, and to subject themselves to the duties of that condition. All persons competent to contract for themselves, may thus enlist into the Army. None who, for any reason whatever, are incompetent to contract for themselves, can enlist without the consent of those who have a legal right to control them and contract for them. As the very essence of a contract is the voluntary assent of the minds of the parties, it is sufficiently obvious that all are incompetent to make contracts, who are incapable for want of understanding to give such assent. Thus idiots and insane persons, and children in early childhood, being unable to understand the subject-matter and give their assent, are clearly incompetent to make contracts. No legislative power can remove the disability. You may, by a legislative act, dispose of their persons and property, but it cannot be said to be done by their consent.

In every civilized country a certain age has been fixed on, as to the period when the disability of youth shall cease. For plain reasons this period must be uniform, and applied to all. It would be impossible to inquire into the degree of capacity of each individual. The feudal system, which once prevailed in most of the States of Europe, fixed this period at the age of twenty-one years. What would seem to render this regulation peculiarly apposite to the present purpose, that system, established by warriors, chiefly with a view to military strength, fixed on this age as a time when a man was supposed to be fit to bear arms, and render the military services by which his lands were held. This rule of the feudal was adopted by the common law, and universally prevails where that law is followed. In each of the United States there is, and it is believed always has been, an entire uniformity on this subject. The disability of minority continues till the age of twenty-one years. No one rule of the common law is more universally known. It is one of the first a child learns. Till the age of twenty-one the parent has a power over the child, for government and education, and has a right to his services. Founded on this acknowledged rule of the common law, in most of the States, statutes from early times have been enacted, regulating the subject of binding to apprenticeship, and also of guardianship, in case of the parent's death. All these, either directly or by necessary inference, recognise the disability of the minor to contract for himself, and the right of the parent or guardian. Under the existence of these laws, thus universally known, the people of the United States, by the Constitution, gave to this Government, the right to raise armies by voluntary enlistment. With whom may the Government, by virtue of the authority thus granted, make this contract? Surely, with such only as have a capacity to contract. The power cannot extend to enlisting minors under the age of twenty-one years, except with the consent of their parents or guardians; because in that way only can valid contracts affecting such persons be made. If the power of enlisting be not limited to that age, nothing would prevent Government from taking from their parents children of more tender years, if idly consenting, and placing them in military schools till prepared for the Army. Would it be contended that Government has power to do this? If not, to what age are they restricted? Of necessity, there must be a general rule as to the age of disability of minors, it being impossible to investigate and determine the capacity of each individual.

The enlisting of minors bound to apprenticeship wholly destroys the rights of masters to the services of their apprentices. The power of this Government to destroy a right so secured by a legal contract has been questioned. The Continental Congress, in the year 1776, though sorely pressed by the war they were then engaged in, and in great want of recruits for their Army, were so deeply impressed with the illegality and injustice of such a practice, that they ordered all apprentices enlisted without the consent of their masters to be immediately discharged. The Congress was too wise to attempt to maintain their cause by violence and injustice. By a statute of the United States of the 16th of March, 1802, the enlisting of minors without the consent of their parents, guardians, or masters, is expressly prohibited, under a heavy penalty. Before that time, though not expressly prohibited by any statute, the instructions to recruiting officers directed them not to enlist minors, without such consent; and whenever it was improperly done, they could obtain discharges by applying to the courts of law. When an attempt was made at the commencement of the present war to authorize such enlistments, it was rejected by the Legislature.

Certain sections of a British statute of March, 1812, have been read by the honorable gentleman, (Mr. GILES) for the purpose of showing that the British Government enlists minors into its army without the consent of their parents or guardians. By that statute, it appears that apprentices, bound by legal indentures, when enlisted without the consent of their masters, are on their request to be discharged. Hence it is inferred that minors, other than apprentices, though enlisted without the consent of their parents or guardians, would not be discharged. If so, it can avail nothing, unless it be shown that our Government possesses a power over its citizens equal to that of the British Government. As well may we justify the exercise of any other arbitrary power, by showing that the British Government exercises the same. It is apparent that that Government respects the contracts of apprenticeship, which by this bill are to be violated. The British statute provides that if any person shall, within four days after enlisting, declare before a magistrate that he enlisted hastily and incautiously, he shall, on refunding the money received as bounty, be discharged. It is to be regretted, that the honorable gentleman who produced this statute of a foreign Government as an example for imitation, had not introduced into this bill that humane provision, so well calculated to guard the unwary against the improper arts and enticements too often practised by recruiting officers. The better opinion seems to be, that this Government has not a right to enlist minors without the consent of their parents or guardians, and it is probable, if such enlistments are directed, the courts of law will, on application, be obliged to discharge the persons so enlisted.

But, sir, were it certain this Government had the right of enlisting into the Army improvident youth, without the consent of those to whom the policy of the law has intrusted the care and control of them, it would be highly inexpedient to resort to such a measure. It is forbidden by all the considerations which have subjected the improvidence of youth to the guide and direction of age and experience. If minors are wanted for the Army, why not address yourself to their parents and guardians? They surely can best judge whether it is suitable and proper for their children and wards to enlist. If there should be no reasonable objections, it must be presumed, they would consent. You will, then, without consent, obtain those only whom you ought not to obtain. It is to be hoped the number will not be great. This measure will tend to weaken the sacred relation between parents and children, and to lessen the power for the discipline and education of youth, the best and safest foundation of all Governments. It is a direct invitation for rebellion against parental authority.

Our infant manufactures, still requiring the fostering aid of Government, and which, in the Northern and Eastern States, are in a considerable degree carried on by the labor of apprentices, will be greatly injured. Without instructing children in manufactures, a sufficient supply of laborers can never be expected. The labor of a skilful mechanic, in the line of his business is more important to the community than his services can be in the Army.

All these objects will be injured in proportion as this attempt is attended with success. And after all the exertions which can be made, it is not probable any great number of recruits can, in this way, be provided. Can a wise Government hazard such valuable interests for the sake of a miserable project of enlisting unwary youth into the Army?

The circumstances of the country being such as to render a standing army of considerable magnitude necessary, I do not wish to excite any unreasonable jealousy against such an establishment. The plan of the Secretary of War contemplates an army of more than one hundred and forty thousand men, at the disposal of Government. It may be worthy of consideration whether such an army, in certain events, which may occur, instead of defending, may not endanger the liberties of the country. On one occasion, at least, it required all the influence and address of their great and good commander to restrain, within the bounds of their duty, the army of the Revolution; than which there is no reason to hope the present will be more patriotic. Surely, it is not to be desired that an unusual proportion of young men, of such early years as not to have become acquainted with the relations and duties of civil life, should be drawn into the Army. Persons educated from childhood in a camp become soldiers of fortune, indifferent in what cause they employ their arms. From a numerous and veteran army danger is mostly to be apprehended, when the civil power rests in feeble hands.

The honorable gentleman (Mr. GILES) has related, that Oliver Cromwell, in the war between the King and Parliament of England, defeated the royalists at the battle of Naseby, by means of a regiment of London apprentices. Has the honorable gentleman forgotten the artful address, used by that hypocritical tyrant, to entice into his army the youth of the country; and then to insinuate himself, by all methods in his power, into their confidence and affections? The same troops who put down the royal power accompanied their ambitious leader to the House of Parliament, and drove from their seats the very men who had raised him to power. They enabled Cromwell to establish a tyranny so odious and oppressive, that the English nation to avoid it, in a short time, surrendered themselves at discretion to the most unprincipled and profligate monarch that ever sat on their throne, and under him patiently bore injuries more grievous than those for which they had brought his father to the block. The people of this country are not more strongly attached to liberty than the English were at the time of Cromwell. The army now recommended will be in number three-fold what he ever possessed. We also may hereafter find a Cromwell in some military demagogue who is now flattering the people with professions of affection and devotion to their cause.

After painting, in strong colors, the distress and danger of the nation, the honorable gentleman has said that strong and energetic measures are necessary to preserve it from ruin; and that light objections ought not to be made. It seems to be supposed that those who shall oppose measures, declared to be brought forward for that purpose, will have the appearance of opposing the necessary defence of the country. But, however unpopular that course may be, it is surely our duty to examine the character and tendency of a measure before we assent to it. In my opinion, what have been called the strong and energetic measures of the Government, have caused our present distress, and nothing but a change can give relief. The various acts composing the system of commercial restrictions, and also the declaration of war, were, in their respective periods, denominated strong and energetic measures. All objections against them were deemed light and trivial. Is there an honest man in the nation who does not now lament that those objections were not heard with proper attention? All the disastrous consequences which have ensued were then foretold. What was then prophecy is now history. To the ill-judged measures of Government may be traced all our misfortunes. They arose from a war unnecessarily waged, and badly conducted; and have been increased by a profuse waste of the treasure, and by a destruction of the credit of the nation. Whether the war was declared through an erroneous estimation of injuries, suffered from a foreign nation, or for the purpose of gratifying a lust for power and patronage, makes little difference to the country. The Administration and their friends are united in opinion that the terms of peace which they have offered to the enemy, provide sufficiently for both the honor and safety of the country. By these terms the pretended causes of the war are abandoned. If, then, without obtaining satisfaction for the past, or security for the future, we can honorably and safely return to a state of peace, we surely might, with equal honor and safety, have remained in that condition. Whatever, therefore, were the injuries suffered from Great Britain, (and I have never deemed them inconsiderable,) it was unnecessary and unwise to declare war. Should a nation, extensively connected in intercourse with others, make every injury sustained a cause of war, it would never be at peace. The inquiry ought to have been, whether the injuries were of such a nature as could not, without loss of honor, be borne, and whether we had the means of obtaining redress by war. The Government has shown no more wisdom or prudence in conducting the war, than in declaring it. In modern times, the strength of a nation for carrying on war essentially consists in its revenue. An empty treasury, the consequence of waste and mismanagement, and the total loss of public credit are the immediate causes of the present distress. When the Government passed into the hands of the party now in power, the nation enjoyed peace and prosperity, an extensive commerce, and ample revenues. After having procured the repeal of the former internal taxes, so abundant was the income from commerce alone, that in his last annual Message to Congress Mr. Jefferson gravely recommended to their consideration the obtaining, by amendments of the Constitution, more enlarged powers and other objects, to enable the Government to expend the surplus of the revenue. All the causes, as far as they depended on foreign nations, which have led to our present condition then existed. At the commencement of the war the Administration proposed their plans of increased revenue to meet the increased expenditures. Their system was adopted by the Legislature in its full extent. Thus far, everything demanded has been granted. What, then, but gross mismanagement and waste can have produced the present deplorable condition of the finances? In the war of the Revolution, without the power of levying taxes, or in any way commanding the resources of the nation, the Government was able to obtain loans in foreign countries. Now, though possessing all the resources necessary for sustaining credit, Government can obtain loans neither at home nor abroad. Economy and good management then gained and established that confidence which waste and profusion have now destroyed. The debt already contracted in this war will be found to be double in amount to the whole debt of the United States at the end of the Revolutionary war. Instances of the grossest profusion are constantly occurring in every department. The cannon designed for the two seventy-four gun ships, and which have been for a long time wanted, are yet to be transported by land from Washington, more than five hundred miles. The mere expense of transportation far exceeds the sum for which they might be made in the vicinity and delivered at the places where wanted. In the war of the Revolution, and also in that of 1798 with France, cannon in abundance were cast in New England; but now, though proposed on the most favorable terms, the Government will not permit a gun to be made for their use in that section of the Union. Speculation and profusion almost universally prevail, to such an extent as could not be borne by any nation. If a remedy be not soon applied, the resources of the country will be entirely exhausted. Without means of subsistence, armies are worse than useless; they become dangerous.

The military force of the country has been no better employed than its pecuniary means.

The gallantry and good conduct of the Navy, and, in several instances, also of the Army, have merited and received the warmest approbation of the nation. Of this, however, the Executive Government is entitled to no share. In awarding the meed of praise for the important victories in the naval battles on the Lakes, Erie and Champlain, truth compelled you to declare, that they were, in both instances, gained over a superior hostile force. The Government merits censure, instead of praise, for exposing to such imminent hazard the great interest staked on the issue of those battles. On Lake Ontario, also, the enemy has been permitted to gain a decided superiority of force. The fleet, built and equipped there at great expense, has become useless. Instead of protecting our own shores from the attacks of the enemy, a large land force is now employed in defending the fleet from threatened destruction. The ships of war on the waters of the Atlantic are mostly laid up in the various harbors, and defended by bodies of militia at enormous expense. Ample appropriations were last year made, not only for all the vessels then in commission, but also for putting into service two new seventy-four gun ships and three frigates. These appropriations have been disregarded. The naval service on the Atlantic, and also the defence of the seaboard seem to be abandoned. The enemy has occupied more than a hundred miles of the eastern seacoast of the State of Massachusetts, including one of the best harbors and naval stations in the United States, all which was defended by less than one hundred troops. Of so little importance has this appeared to the Government, that the President, whose duty it is to lay before the Legislature information of the state of the Union, omitted even to mention it in his Message at the opening of the session. Not a movement has been made to regain that valuable territory; but the enemy is left to fortify and secure it at his leisure.

The military force, instead of defending the country, has been employed in the idle and fruitless attempt to conquer the provinces of Canada. With their whole power bent to that object, during three campaigns, the Government have lost their two principal fortresses, Niagara and Michilimackinac, and gained nothing. Still, this wild project is to be pursued. The Secretary of War, in his report, announces the intention of the Administration, with a hundred thousand regular troops, "to touch the feelings and excite the apprehensions of the British Government by pushing the war into Canada." These are bold counsels for men who lately, without drawing a sword, fled in dismay and disgrace from their own capitol, before a handful of the enemy. They now, in pompous language, promise forthwith to overrun two provinces, and then ascend the plains of Abraham, and storm the strongest fortress on our continent. Rashness in counsel, and imbecility in execution do not constitute strong claims to confidence. Can the nation longer repose confidence in such counsels? Is it wise and safe to expend our utmost resources in weak and extravagant projects, in which past experience destroys even the hope of future success? The conquest of Canada should in my opinion never have been undertaken; and the idle attempt ought immediately to be abandoned. Already, too much blood and treasure have been wasted in the pursuit of an object, which, were it desirable, cannot be attained. Without a naval force, to command the mouth of the St. Lawrence and prevent the arrival of troops and supplies, as they may be wanted, Canada cannot be conquered. By means of such force, the British succeeded in wresting those provinces from France; and for want of it, we failed in our attempt, in the war of the Revolution, when the regular troops there were few, and the inhabitants almost universally inclined to favor us. For the prosecution of this fruitless object, I will give no aid.

For the necessary and proper defence of the country, neither men nor pecuniary means are, in my opinion, to be withheld. Even to the present Administration, so long as they continue to be clothed with Constitutional authority, and shall not have given the most unequivocal and decisive evidence of having abandoned that defence, I will, for that purpose, and restricted to that object, grant all that could be necessary under a wise and prudent Administration. Such grants, however, must be within the limits, and in all respects according to the provisions of the Constitution. Beyond those limits, under no pressure of circumstances, will I consent to go. Should the national defence be abandoned by the General Government, I trust the people, if still retaining a good portion of their resources, may rally under their State Governments against foreign invasion, and rely with confidence on their own courage and virtue.

SENATE.

Militia of the United States.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

TUESDAY, November 22.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution appointing a committee on their part to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to inquire and report whether Congress may not be more conveniently accommodated, either by an alteration of the present chambers, or by procuring other rooms within a convenient distance of the public offices; in which resolution they request the concurrence of the Senate.

MILITIA OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof for their respective quotas of — thousand militia for the defence of the frontiers of the United States.

Mr. GORE addressed the Chair as follows: There is no truth more evident than that the general, sovereign, and uncontrolled power of the several States, over the militia, remains with them respectively, except in certain specified cases, in which the Congress has authority to provide for calling out this force, which, while so called into the service of the United States is subject to your Government, preserving always their officers and militia organization, and excluding from the command all other officers, except only the President of the United States.

The cases are, when insurrections exist, when the laws of the Union cannot be executed by the civil powers when an invasion is made.

"The Congress may provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws, to suppress insurrections, to repel invasion."

For no other purposes can the United States call them forth, in no other service can they require their aid.

"The Congress may provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

The power of organizing and disciplining the militia seems to have been granted for the purpose of enabling this force to operate efficiently. That, when called to act, the militia of the several States might manœuvre alike, and having the same military language and ideas, might understand and comprehend each other, as well as the orders of their superiors, and be usefully combined to effect the object proposed.

That Congress should provide for arming the militia was necessary to place them in a condition to act as soldiers; for if he not a contradiction to call militia without arms, soldiers, it is assuming very much the character of a petty German potentate, ambitious of military fame, who procured a large number of wax figures in warlike attitude and habiliment, which he called his army, and then fancied himself equal to his more wealthy neighbors, who, at great expense, supported a large body of soldiers of flesh and blood, well armed and accoutred. We are told by well informed Senators on this floor, that the United States are unable, that the States respectively are unable, that the individuals themselves are unable, to arm the militia.

I truly hope, sir, that this picture of the deplorable condition of our country is founded in error. If it be not, it is a very important addition to that mass of evidence which is daily crowding on our minds, of the fatal improvidence of engaging in this destructive war.

If it be not in the power of the nation, nor of the several States, nor of the individuals, to provide arms for eighty thousand militia, why call them forth to eat the bread of idleness, and provide the certain means of victory to our foe, and defeat to ourselves? Why continue to propagate delusion? Why this empty boast of taking Canada, of expelling the British from every foot of the Continent, and dictating the conditions of peace to the Court of London?

Believe me, sir, rather believe the accounts, which are pouring into this desolated capital by every mail, from every quarter and corner of the country, that blind confidence, which, trusting to proclamations and the extravagant vaunts of ignorance and indolence, has delivered this generous people a prey to the weakest of men, and the worst of passions, is fast dissipating, and will soon cease to hide from them the dreadful abyss into which they have been plunged, and the enormity of those delinquencies which have impoverished, dishonored, and degraded them.

Whether it be true or not, that the people are capable of arming themselves, or the States of providing the arms, there is no good reason for receiving men who come without arms and equipments, and thus filling your muster rolls with such beings, as, in no sense of the word, can be considered soldiers, but mere cormorants, to devour the remnant of sustenance, which can yet be wrung from this industrious nation, whom presumptuous folly has rendered bankrupt.

We too well know the fact, that great, rich, and powerful States issue forth unarmed legions, and boast of having complied with requisitions for soldiers to fight the battles of their country.

We are told that the Executive provides such men with arms and equipments. Where the authority is to be found for thus favoring any State I am yet to learn. If allowed to some, and not to all, it is unequal, and therefore unjust.

Further, sir, some years since a law was enacted, appropriating an annual sum of money for the purchase of arms to be distributed among the States. To certain favored States arms were supplied, to others none. The neglected States have lately received a small part of their proportion. Whence was derived the authority thus to discriminate, to favor some States, and neglect others, is unknown to me. Sure I am it is consistent neither with policy nor justice.

It is, however, of the same character with that justice, or rather injustice, which furnishes arms and equipments, rations and wages, to the unarmed soldiers of some of the States, while it refuses provisions and payment to soldiers, well armed and equipped, who are called forth to defend others, and afford that protection which the United States had expressly guaranteed to them, but have totally neglected. An attempt is made to justify this refusal, on pretensions the most unfounded and illegitimate, on pretensions set up in violation of that principle in the Constitution which insures to the respective States the appointment of the officers of the militia.

I have said that the authority of the United States to govern the militia exists only when the militia is in their service.

The United States cannot govern the militia, cannot train them, until in their service, and even then the States, respectively, have the exclusive power of appointing their officers. The Constitution makes but one exception to this exclusive power, that is in favor of the President of the United States, who is declared to be Commander-in-Chief of the militia, when in the actual service of the United States. There is not a tittle of authority for any other officer of the United States to assume the command of the militia. Thus sacredly is the right of the several States to their militia guarded and secured. There is no power of the individual States, so positively and emphatically reserved. The other powers of the several States depend on the principle, that what is not granted is retained, confirmed by an express stipulation, that the powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people; but this authority of the respective States over their militia, recognised in the Constitution as "necessary to the security of a free State," over and above the force attached to it by this sound principle, is guaranteed and hedged about by all the securities and guards that language could prescribe; and if it can be invaded, and by the honorable members of this Senate, the Constitutional guardians of the rights and sovereignties of the States, there is an end of all security from Constitutions on paper, and we may resign ourselves to the contempt and ridicule of the weakest as well as the wisest of men.

All the other offspring of their sovereignty they had resigned, and have already attended them to that grave which has swallowed up much of the honor, most of the property, and all the public credit of the nation. This the States would not surrender, but in great emergency, and for very limited periods, always keeping them within their own sight, under their immediate and vigilant inspection, and under the peculiar care of officers in whom they had a special confidence, and who could look to them alone for patronage and support, that the affections of the men might not be alienated from their parent State. On this force do the States depend for protection and support, in every peril that can be imagined from domestic violence or foreign invasion, and in that dreaded event, which God grant may never happen, of the powers which they had surrendered being turned to the destruction of their own liberties.

Every one, sir, who will attentively examine and consider the language of the Constitution; who will bring to his mind, either by recollection or reading, what passed in the several States when this instrument was presented to them for acceptance, will be satisfied that I have not misconceived nor misconstrued the views of those who framed, or of those who ratified, this grant of power to the United States.

As there is no pretence that insurrections exist, or that the laws cannot be executed, and there is reason for expecting invasion, it is presumed that the bill is bottomed on that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to provide for calling forth the militia to repel invasion. On this ground it is to be inferred, for the bill nowhere mentions this to be the object of the requisition which it authorizes the President to make for eighty thousand militia, to serve for two years. The service to which they are called, according to the title, is to protect the frontiers against invasion. Now, sir, I contend Congress has no authority to provide for calling forth the militia, to serve for two years, in protection of the frontiers.

Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to repel invasion. What is the intent of the terms of the Constitution which grant this power, compared with the other provisions of the instrument, and the duties of the United States? To repel invasion, means to resist and drive back a sudden and hostile incursion. On an expected irruption, the militia might naturally be presumable to be the only force at command; and, from the interests they had at stake, might be expected to act with promptitude and vigor. Experience had shown that to such service, short in duration, sudden and urgent in emergency, they were well adapted; while for long campaigns, and extended times of service, they were altogether unfit. Unprepared by discipline, by regular and constant subordination, to support the fatigues and privations of a camp, such a force would be most incompetent to discharge the duties of protracted warfare. The militia consists of men of all professions and of all conditions. The enterprise of the merchant, the useful and indispensable labor of the agriculturist, the steady diligence of the mechanic, are all sacrificed by calling them to act the part of soldiers, for which most of them are singularly disqualified, and all their various branches of productive industry are ruined, to do that badly which a small portion of their earnings could procure to be well done. The Constitution never intended that the militia should prosecute the general purposes of war; it did not intend that this should be the force relied on for permanent defence and protection against invasion; for the instrument expressly guarantees to every State, that the United States would protect each of them against invasion. Such protection could be afforded only by ships of war, and fortresses, well armed and manned. This could not be done by the militia of the several States, over which the United States have no control, except a very limited one; and in certain specified cases, which do not include that of protecting against invasion, but only that of repelling invasion which actually exists.

The section that insures to each State protection against invasion, confirms the meaning I have given to the terms repel invasion.

The United States are bound, not only to protect each of the States from invasion, but also to provide for the common defence. This cannot be done by the militia, but must be by regular armies, which they have power to raise for any length of time, on whatever conditions they may please to prescribe, and under whatever officers they may choose to appoint. The militia does not belong to the United States; they cannot even train them, nor appoint their officers. The militia belong to the several States. It is called the militia of the several States in the very clause of the Constitution which constitutes the President Commander-in-Chief of this force when in the actual service of the United States.

Nothing could be more strange than to suppose that the Constitution imposed a duty of this importance on one power, and looked to the forces of another for its performance, over which forces the power on whom this obligation rested had not so much control as to appoint their officers, or even train them.

It would be equally strange, and more unjust, to presume, after the several States had granted to the United States unlimited powers to raise armies, and resources competent to meet the expenses, in return for which the United States obliged themselves to provide for the common defence, and to protect each State against invasion, that the United States could rightfully call on the several States to make this common defence, and protect themselves respectively against invasion, with the very force which, in terms the most unequivocal, they had reserved for their own purposes.

The language of the Constitution never can be tortured into such absurd contradictions, nor to effect such manifest injustice; yet this bill can be supported on no other construction. It authorizes a requisition on the several States for their militia to defend the frontiers, that is, for the common defence, and for the protection of each State against invasion. Duties the United States have solemnly contracted to perform for those States, on whom the call is now made to do it for themselves.

Further, the bill authorizes the President to make this requisition of militia to serve for two years. There is not a particle of authority in the Constitution to justify a call for their service for two years. When the object contemplated in the Constitution is attained, the power of the United States ceases. Its authority over the militia is spent. If you can require them for two, you may for ten years, during the war, or for life.

Neither in terms nor in fact, is this requisition made, to provide for any of the cases in which the Constitution authorizes a call by the United States for the militia of the several States.

Although the men may possibly be suffered to repel an invasion, this is nowhere mentioned as any part of their duty, or any portion of the service they are expected to perform. They are called out generally for the defence of the frontiers, that is, to protect against invasion, a duty specially imposed on the United States, by an express provision of the Constitution, and one very different from that, viz: to repel invasion, which the militia is bound to perform at the requisition of the United States.

I therefore cannot refrain from pronouncing this bill unconstitutional, and in derogation of rights positively reserved to the several States.

The second section provides for classing the men, and procuring the number wanted, by contract or compulsion.

The United States have no authority to govern the militia, or even to train them, until they are in their service. This right is reserved to the States respectively. By this bill the United States undertake to govern the militia previously to their being brought into their service, and to direct the mode by which they shall be called forth, that is, to distribute the whole militia of each State into classes, and oblige each class, voluntarily raised by their order, to hire a man, or submit to a draught.

This is the first step on the odious ground of conscription; a plan, sir, which never will and never ought to be submitted to by this country, while it retains one idea of civil freedom—a plan, sir, which, if attempted, will be resisted by many States, and at every hazard. In my judgment, sir, it should be resisted by all who have any regard to public liberty or the rights of the several States.

This provision to class the militia into divisions, and take from each an individual by compulsion, will appear to be introduced merely for the purpose of familiarizing this arbitrary and tyrannical process to the minds of men, by making the first motion, in a manner presumed to be the least disgusting, under the direction of State officers, and only on the militia, for purposes pretendedly legitimate, as respects that body, and for an object the most interesting to them, the defence of their own firesides. The people readily discern that the next step will be for a conscription, for any purpose, and by any individual designated by the General Government.

The honey on the edges of the cup will not disguise the bitterness of the venomous drug at its bottom. The veil, sir, is too thin to conceal the hideous monster, which to be hated, to be avoided, to be destroyed, needs but to be seen.

I know of no purpose, I can conceive of none for making this bill, but to introduce provisions as the ground-work for other schemes, which have been introduced a little prematurely, and before this deluded people can be brought to receive the last chain, which shall bind them to the unrelenting will of despotism. Laws are now in full force, which provide for bringing forth the militia, in all the cases authorized by the Constitution. These have been sanctioned by time and experience, and the provisions have been found competent to their object.

There never has been, as I can learn, the smallest objection in a single State to rendering prompt obedience to any call for the militia, deemed legitimate by those on whom it was made, and whenever the requisition has been assented to, there has been no delay, no tardiness, no inability in the uncontrolled and unassisted power of the States to bring forth the militia demanded. They need neither your direction nor advice how to comply with Constitutional requisition. And they will not suffer your interference in a business which they consider, and rightly consider, their own.

There is a section, sir, which after all the pretence to provide a local force, for the defence of the homes of the militia, shows the whole to be a delusion. A large porch is made, and fine scaffolding erected, merely to introduce the General Government to the private purses of individuals to aid them in filling the ranks of the regular Army; leaving the several States, as they always have been, to take care of themselves, while the force on which they depended is marched off to perish in the wilds of Canada.

Finally, the several States, previously to the Confederation, held their respective militias in undiminished sovereignty; under the Confederation, the several States were bound to keep up a regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred; but the supreme control over this force remained with them, respectively, and unaltered. In this condition they were, when the existing Constitution was adopted.

"Every right, power, or authority, not delegated by the Constitution to the General Government, nor prohibited by it to the States, is reserved to the States respectively." No general power over the militia was delegated to the United States. The only power delegated in this respect was a limited authority, in three cases. The United States can exercise no other. If they attempt to extend an authority beyond the grant, the several States have a right, and are bound by duty to their own citizens, to resist the usurpation. The measure and manner of resistance are altogether within their own discretion. The surrender of such rights of sovereignty, and of other inferior rights, by the several States, as the Constitution contains, was with a view of attaining compensation in the reciprocal engagements of the United States.

The several States granted to the United States power to raise armies, to provide and maintain a navy, and resources sufficient to support them. In consideration for parting with rights so essential to their preservation, they received a solemn promise from the United States that they would provide for the common defence, and protect each State against invasion. Have the United States done either? Does not this bill attempt to take from the several States that force which they had respectively reserved to themselves for their own purposes, and apply it to uses which the United States are bound to provide for by other means?

All the articles of a league, or confederacy, have the force and nature of reciprocal promises and of conditions, which, by a default, are rendered null.

With a deep sense of the importance of this Union to the happiness and prosperity of all its members, I am bound to resist any infraction of the ties which unite them together, in order to render perpetual that, which seems to be dissolving under us.

In such motives, and in support of the dearest interests of the nation, the House will find the grounds of my opposition to this bill. The only thing wanted from Congress in relation to the militia, under the existing laws, is a provision for receiving into the employment and pay of the United States, at the discretion of the President, such bodies of State troops, for such terms and under such conditions as any of them may consent to raise.

An honorable friend of mine, from the State of New York, now detained from this House by indisposition, anxious to afford his aid in providing for the defence of the country by all Constitutional means, on Saturday last offered a motion, with this view. The honorable chairman of the committee which introduced the bill, declined to receive it at that time, and preferred to consider it on the third reading of the bill. He being unable, for the reason assigned, now to submit the motion, I take the liberty to offer the same, which is in the following words:

"That the committee be instructed so to modify the bill that it shall provide for calling into the service of the United States, from time to time, in execution of the provisions of the Constitution, and according to the mode heretofore practised, — thousand militia, to serve for terms not exceeding nine months; with an option to the several States, in lieu of such detachments of militia, to raise and furnish, for the service of the United States, for the term of two years, unless sooner discharged, bodies of State troops equal in number to their respective quotas of militia; such State troops to be organized, armed, and equipped, according to law; their officers to be appointed by the respective States; their services to be limited within the States in which they shall be raised, or within an adjoining State; to be subject to the rules and articles of war, and to receive the same pay, clothing, rations, and forage, and to be entitled to the same privileges and immunities as the troops of the United States."

On the call of Mr. DANA, the question was divided, and taken on recommitting the bill; and it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Daggett, Dana, Gaillard, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, and Varnum.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Chace, Condit, Fromentin, Giles, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Walker, Wharton, and Worthington.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH then rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

SENATE.

Militia of the United States.

Mr. President: When the subject was first brought before the Committee, I was so unfortunate as to be absent, and have therefore only had an opportunity of passing upon some of its provisions. As the bill has now arrived at that stage of its progress when it is permitted to review it throughout, I must offer my former absence as an apology for detaining the Senate a few moments, and will limit myself, in the course of my remarks, to two points only, viz: the length of the time the militia are intended to be kept out, and the mode of classing them to force them out.

I had hoped, sir, though vainly, that, among the innumerable amendments which this bill was destined to suffer, it would have been so radically reformed in principle and so ameliorated in its provisions, that I could have voted for it. The professed object of this bill, the defence of the States, is particularly dear to me, and, if pursued in a Constitutional mode, would command my hearty concurrence; but I have to lament that the measure, which now seems likely to be adopted for that purpose, is such, that I cannot participate in it. Notwithstanding the unrelaxing exertions which have been made to bring the provisions of this bill within the fair limits of Constitutional jurisdiction, and to temper its severity to the feelings of the people, its greatest deformity still exists, the most hideous feature in its whole composition remains unsoftened, and I am therefore bound by a solemn sense of duty to the country, and acting under the awful responsibility of an oath, to oppose its passage.

There has been a marked and studied distinction preserved between the army and the militia of the country. The one is a permanent, the other a temporary force, intended for temporary purposes. In time of peace, no force is more competent, none more adapted "to repress insurrections, or to execute the laws," than the militia; but, surely, sir, it can never be intended to be exclusively relied on for defence, during a period of war. There can be little doubt, when the Constitution speaks of the militia "to repel invasion," it rather regarded the occasional irruptions of the Indians upon our back frontiers, than the disembarking of large bodies of finely trained European troops upon our shores. Those who are practically skilled in the art of war will tell you, that nothing but the system and discipline of regulars, can meet regulars with effect; and although occasions may be presented when militia have merited every honor which can be due to victory and good conduct, yet an exclusive reliance on them, in times like these, threatened, as we are, with formidable fleets and armies, would be to discard the best lessons of experience, and to jeopardize the fate of the country. That the militia, as such, would be a good auxiliary force, I am prepared to admit. Dispersed through every part of the country and formed into convenient corps, they might be made to fall upon and harass the enemy at his landing, and from their superior knowledge of the country, under brave and enterprising officers, they would gall him, impede and obstruct his progress, until the disciplined regulars, which, in a war like this, ought to be stationed at eligible points, and in considerable bodies, from one end of the continent to the other, could be brought to their relief. If, to remedy the defects of want of discipline in the militia, it is contemplated to confine them to a camp for two years, it is this unusual period of service, it is the mode that is intended to be used to force them out, and the conversion of the militia into regular troops that I complain of, and which, in my judgment, constitutes a palpable and flagrant violation of the Constitution.

In the general enumeration of the powers of Congress, sir, we shall find that part of the Constitution which bears upon this subject. Congress shall have power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." These are the three objects for which Congress can alone provide for calling out the militia, and when these, or either of these objects, cease to exist, the militia are no longer subject to duty. It is impossible for Congress to decide how long the militia shall be held to service, because they cannot determine how long the emergency will exist for which they are called. It is, therefore, that we are to understand the language of the Constitution as confining the power of Congress entirely to providing how and by whom the call upon the militia is to be made, leaving the responsibility both of the call and of the decision on the continuance of the service upon that power to which Congress shall think proper to assign it; and leaving it also exclusively to the States, to whom alone it rightfully belongs, to furnish the troops in their own way. So far from Congress having any Constitutional power to retain the militia in service for a fixed and determinate period of time, the Constitution has itself given another standard by which their term of service shall be measured, and that is, the continuance of the exigence they are called to meet. After Congress have provided for calling out the militia, by vesting the power, as it usually has done, in the President of the United States, it has discharged all its duties, and the President will then decide upon his responsibility to the nation, when it is necessary to exercise the power, and when the exigence for which the call was authorized ceases to exist. As Congress cannot calculate the length of time during which either insurrection, or opposition to the laws, or invasion, may continue, and as the power thus vested in the President to make the call and judge of the period of service, might, in certain events, impose a long, and painful, and ruinous duty, upon one body of the militia, the general power given to Congress to provide for calling them forth, clearly enables them to provide a succession of militia at easy intervals, to take the place of those who are on duty; so as to prevent the whole burden from falling too severely upon any one portion of the people. It was in this view of the Constitution, and with this intention, that the law of February, 1795, was passed, to provide for calling forth the militia. The fourth section of the law is, "that the militia

'employed in the service of the United States, shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war as the troops of the United States; and that no officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, of the militia, shall be compelled to serve more than three months after his arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year, nor more than in due rotation with every other able-bodied man of the same rank in the battalion to which he belongs.'

This early exposition of this part of the Constitution is unquestionably the surest and the safest guide of construction; and as the powers here granted were both to be vested in and exercised by the illustrious President of the Convention which formed that Constitution, and the act itself received his sanction, I am at a loss to conjecture how the true intent and meaning of any part of that instrument could be more clearly and more satisfactorily ascertained. By this law, the President of the United States is authorized to call out the militia, but they cannot be kept in service longer than three months after their arrival at the place of rendezvous, nor can they be made to serve longer than a due rotation with every other member of the same rank in the battalion from which they are taken. Here, then, I derive the distinction between Congress undertaking to provide, by law, that the militia shall be kept in camp for two years, unless sooner discharged, and their providing by law that the militia shall not be kept out more than three months. In the first case, Congress are made to prescribe the time for which they shall be kept in camp, which they have no power to do. In the last, so far from designating the time they shall serve, they only mean to prescribe the period of rotation, beyond which the same body of militia shall not serve. If the emergency continues beyond three months, new calls of militiamen are to be made to relieve those who perform the first tour of duty; and it is not and never was intended, by the language of the Constitution, that Congress should say how long the militia shall serve, but merely judging of the condition of the country, and the necessities and conveniences of the people, they govern themselves by such considerations in exercising their powers "to provide for calling forth the militia" in such numbers, and in such rotation, as the public emergency may require. The distinction, to my view, is neither subtle nor nice, but founded in a just discretion, and exerted for a correct and benevolent purpose, to rescue the great body of the people from a painful and unjust oppression.

So far, sir, from vesting the Congress of the United States with power to call the militia into camp for two years, you well know, Mr. President, that the great contest of the Convention was, whether this power, "to provide for calling forth the militia," should be given to Congress at all. And it was a question of long, dubious, and animated debate, whether it should be left exclusively to the States, or whether it should be given in certain specified cases, to be exercised by the Federal Government. If, at that time, it could have been anticipated that the power thus reluctantly and jealously yielded up and guarded by strict limitation, would ever have been used, by this or any other Congress, to drag the people of this country from their homes, their families, and their occupations, to consign them to the toils and deprivations of a camp for two years, those celebrated champions in that great cause, who have been justly styled the fathers of our Constitution, would never have prevailed to have procured this power to the General Government.

But, sir, the unconstitutionality of this measure, though defect enough to justify my opposition to it, is not the only defect. There is a rigor and severity in the provisions of this bill never before practised, which will stir up a feeling of uneasiness and restless displeasure, and which the condition of the people of this country will not endure. On whom, let me ask, sir, will this grievous oppression principally fall? It will fall upon the middling ranks in society, upon your tenantry, your mechanics, your manufacturers—men who constitute the very bone and muscle of your population. Men of wealth will procure substitutes—the poorest and humblest in rank will be compelled by their necessities, during a period of war, to enlist with recruiting sergeants, or to be absorbed by the provisions in the ninth section of this bill; whilst the chief burden of this odious conscription will fall upon those whose circumstances in life are too humble to afford extravagant bounties for substitutes, but whose feelings are too proud, and habits too reputable, to suffer them to become the corrupted hirelings of others. This class of men, thus marked out for destruction by this bill, is infinitely the most numerous, as well as the most useful in society. Their services, in their respective avocations, are essential to the interest as well as to the convenience of the community in which they live, and their personal labor and daily attention to their own affairs are indispensably necessary to the support of themselves and their families. To tear these men away from home to serve in the militia for only three months at a time, is to impose a serious evil on them, but if you drag them off, as you here contemplate by this bill, and keep them in camp for two years, you complete their ruin, you entail distress and misery upon their families, perhaps starvation and death. During their absence, and an absence, too, under a system of coercion before unheard of in our country, their former habits will become the abodes of wretchedness. Sir, I want language to depict the sufferings that will flow from this tyrannical system. Those whom the industry of a father or a husband may have once clad in simple neatness, and fed with comfortable fare, will be left disconsolate in penury, to wrap their chilled limbs in the tattered remnants of his former bounty. Deprived, by this your act, of their only source of comfort, their protector and support, many who have been bred in all the decencies of life, will be thrown, like common mendicants, upon the world, to subsist upon its precarious charity. Should it be ordained that the wretched father is to be restored to his former home, after the expiration of this lingering and ruinous period of service, he will return, not to the cheerful cottage which he left, where joy and plenty smiled, but to a comfortless dwelling, from which want and misery have chased every endearment, save only those whom Providence may have spared, to meet their benefactors' return, with haggard eye and squalid aspect, the miserable evidences of his long and cruel exile. These, sir, are to be some of the certain results of this dreadful conscription; and how few of the many who are doomed to suffer, now dream of the distress which you are at this hour preparing for them! Sir, believe me, there is no fiction in all this; it is but a faint sketch of the calamities that are destined to afflict us, the reality of which will far outstrip the anticipation of the liveliest imagination. Let me then ask you, sir, if you really intend to adopt this system as the law of the land, hostile as it is to the Constitution, and pregnant with all these ills? Have the people of this country not yet suffered enough? Will this honorable Senate, wise, discreet, and reflecting, on whom the nation rests its hopes, to whom they have been taught to look in the moment of anxiety and trial, and upon whose floor, we have been once told, the last expiring struggles of the liberties of this country would be exhibited, if they are doomed to expire—will they sanction, by their approbation, such a measure as this?

Sir, it is not wise in those who are ambitious of fame to indulge too much in prophetic views of things, but I fancy that I put little to hazard, when I say, carry this system into execution when you will, and you will find that the people of the country will not bear it; not that a party will not bear it, but the great body of the people will frown indignant upon this attempt to despoil them of the blessings of their Constitutional rights and personal liberties.

Sir, you dare not, at least I hope you dare not, attempt a conscription to fill the ranks of your regular army. When the plan of the Secretary of War made its appearance, it was gratifying to find that it met with the abhorrence of almost every man in the nation, and the merit of the bill before you, if such a measure can be supposed to have merit at all, is, that it is little else, as regards the militia, than a servile imitation of the Secretary's plan. And will you treat your militia with more rigor than you are willing to practise upon your regular soldiers? Will you adopt a system of tyranny towards them, that you are reluctant to attempt towards the Army? Availing yourselves of the popular appellation of militia, you undertake to enforce a system of conscription whose very severity must rouse those who may have been lulled into acquiescence, by a total want of suspicion. Thus, sir, it is, that the war-spirit of the nation has sunk so low that, like the fallen public credit of the country, neither banks or bounties can revive it. And the advocates of this bill, becoming rash by disaster, since neither monstrous bounties in money or in land will avail them, now call upon us to pursue the freemen of the country, even to their very hearths and firesides, to drag them forth in handcuffs to the field of battle, there to fight against the wrongs of impressment, and to conquer the freedom of the seas.

Mr. President, there is a foreboding that arises from all this which fills me with the deepest concern. The growth of tyranny, when it once begins, is strong and rapid. A few years past, and the name of conscription was never uttered but it was coupled with execration; last year, it found its way into a letter from the then Secretary of War to the chairman of the Military Committee, and it was then so odious that it was but little exposed to view. This year, we have conscription openly recommended to us by the Secretary of War in an official paper; and, worst of all, it finds champions and advocates on this floor. What have we to expect next, but that, in the ensuing year, we shall see it stalking abroad through the land, accompanied by its loathsome train of fetters and chains, and executioners. And why is all this to be done? The necessity of the crisis is offered as the plea; yes, sir, necessity, that blood-stained plea of tyrants, which has served every scheme of usurpation, to sacrifice the lives and liberties of men, to aid its projects of self-aggrandizement and ambition, is now given to justify this measure; nothing is therefore left to us, but, before it be too late, to improve the experience which the misfortunes of others have taught us, to our own and the national preservation. The necessities of the times, of which we hear so much and feel so sensibly, ought properly enough to urge us to active and animated exertions in behalf of the nation; there is a vigor and a zeal which should characterize all our conduct at this doubtful moment; but the ardor which impels to action should be watched, lest it betray us into error and excess. Times of imminent peril and alarm, are periods when public liberty is most in danger, and it is difficult to decide whether he is the worthiest patriot who goes to battle in defence of a nation's rights, or he who stands the faithful sentinel over the Constitution in times of general effervescence, to guard it from violation and abuse.

Unwilling, sir, to consume the time of the Senate, whose patience, as well as my own, has been much exhausted by the lingering progress of this bill, I shall content myself with the remarks I have made upon the point which seemed most particularly to demand an open and avowed opposition. Having before taken an occasion to express my opinion upon the other exceptionable parts of the bill. I will not trouble you with a recapitulation.

I must once more express to you, Mr. President, the deep regret I feel, at not being able to give my vote in favor of a measure, which is said to be designed to be for the defence of the States. There is not a man in this Senate, or in this nation, who is more willing, or who will go further in applying the true means of the country to its defence at this time, than myself. But, upon all questions, sir, there are certain bounds beyond which I can never consent to go; and I must be understood at all times, whatever pledges I may make, as imposing this restriction, this obligation upon myself, viz: neither to overleap the limits of the Constitution, or to be accessory to an invasion of the essential principles of civil liberty.

On the question, Shall this bill pass? it was then taken and determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 12, as follows:

On the second ballot, there were: For Mr. GAILLARD, 16; Mr. KING, 10; Mr. CHACE, 5; and Mr. ANDERSON, 1.

"Honorable Gentlemen: While I lament the sudden and melancholy event which has led to the distinguished honor conferred on me, I am so truly sensible of my own incompetency to discharge the duties of the station to which I am called, in a manner suitable to their importance, and correspondent to the dignity of this honorable body, that I approach the exercise of them with unfeigned diffidence and apprehension. All that I dare hope is, that my efforts will be considered as the result of well-meant intentions: all that I dare promise is, that my best exertions shall be directed to a faithful and impartial execution of the trust confided to me. Relying, then, on the candor and liberality which have ever characterized this respectable Assembly, I will proceed to the performance of the duties assigned me."

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred two resolutions of the 7th instant, "instructing them to inquire what provision should be made for the appointment of officers above the grade of Captain in the Navy of the United States," and also, "to inquire what provision should be made for conferring naval rank by brevet, in consideration of meritorious service," made a report as follows:

That your committee assume it as a policy now settled, that the United States are to have a permanent Naval Establishment, which is to be gradually increased, according to circumstances, and as the ability of the Government may permit. Your committee deem it unnecessary to go into a course of reasoning to support the soundness of this policy, and to establish (what is now generally conceded) that a navy is the most appropriate, the most efficient, and the least expensive defence of this country.

The commercial and maritime habits of a large portion of the people of the United States press them to the ocean; hence have arisen competition and rivalry with other nations, pursuing the same course of industry. The history of all nations teaches us that the persons and the property of our citizens on the high seas, unprotected, must be (as indeed they have been) the subjects of frequent violence and injustice. The true remedy against these maritime wrongs is maritime force. A navy, growing up with the growth of the nation, cannot fail, before the lapse of many years, to procure respect from abroad, and safety at home.

Congress, apparently influenced by these considerations, at an early period after the establishment of the General Government, created a Naval Department, and have authorized, from time to time, the building of ships of war, until the Navy has become respectable, both from the number and rates of its vessels, and, still more so, from the gallantry and splendor of its achievements. By the laws now in force, the Navy will consist of four seventy-fours, three thirty-sixes, eight sloops of war, besides a great number of brigs and schooners, carrying, on the whole, not less than thirteen hundred guns. Of these, there remain to be put on the stocks one of the seventy-fours and four of the forty-fours. This force is exclusive of the gunboats, the flotillas, and lake squadrons; the latter of which consist of between thirty and forty ships, some of which are large. The national vessels on the Lakes do not carry less than five hundred guns.

Your committee are not aware, nor do they believe, that any nation possessing a naval force, such as the above, is without a grade of officers above that of captain. The nation with whom the United States are now at war, is said to have about a thousand public ships; to command which, she has not less than two hundred admirals of ten different grades, ascending from rear admiral of the blue to the admiral of the fleet. At present, the Navy of the United States is commanded by commissioned officers of three grades only, lieutenants, master commandants, and post captains.

The committee would feel that they had not done justice to the subject committed to them, if they failed to contrast the situation of the Army with that of the Navy, as it respects the scope of promotion in each. The Army presents, for the encouragement of an honorable ambition, the high station of major general through ten different grades. It has also advantages in the variety of its corps unknown to the Navy. The youth of our country, ambitious of military fame, may, according to their taste, enter the Army as officers of cavalry, of artillery, of infantry, or of the rifle corps. Not so with the naval officer. All that he can expect, is, to be transferred from a subordinate station to the command of a ship of war. The rapid promotions of late in the Army cannot but strongly impress the naval officer with a deep sense of his own confined situation, and of the cheerless prospect before him. Does not justice, then, dictate that the range for promotion should be enlarged in our Naval Establishment?

Your committee are of opinion that a discreet policy and a prudent foresight, not less than a just regard to the strong claims of the Navy, call for an enlargement of the sphere of promotion. It cannot be long before the Navy will be called on to sail in squadron. The highest attainments in naval tactics should be encouraged. If you expect men to labor for the highest qualifications in their professions, it is necessary to open to them the way to the station requiring them. The surest mean by which you will probably induce the officers to qualify themselves for an admiral's command, is, to create that grade in the Navy; thereby requiring, in the same act, great professional attainments, and offering a reward for them.

Your committee are therefore of opinion, that, whether they view this subject in reference to the practice of older and more experienced nations, or in regard to the just claims and the long and meritorious services of the naval officers, or with a view to a just, prudent, and liberal policy, on the part of the Government, a grade or grades superior to that of captain should now be created in the Naval Establishment.

As to the second resolution, relative to conferring naval rank by brevet, it does occur to your committee as necessary; it having been the practice of the Government to confer actual rank without regard to seniority, in reward of brilliant achievements or meritorious service.

The committee respectfully submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize by law the appointment of officers above the grade of captain in the Navy of the United States.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to make any provision for conferring naval rank by brevet.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 15, 1814.

SIR: In answer to the inquiry contained in your letter of the 8th instant, founded upon two resolutions of the Senate, passed on the 7th instant, instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire "what provision should be made for the appointment of officers above the grade of captain in the Navy of the United States," and "what provision should be made for conferring naval rank by brevet, in consideration of meritorious service," I have the honor to represent, that the high character which the American Navy has justly acquired; the general sentiment which indicates its rapid increase and permanency; and the long, faithful, and honorable service which its senior officers have rendered their country; appear to me to justify and call for the appointment of officers of a higher grade than that of captain.

Love of country, and the laudable desire of honorable fame, are strong excitements to noble action; but the prospect of progressive promotion to the highest distinction which talents, zeal, and valor, may justly aspire to, is not perhaps less active and stimulating.

Captains of long and honorable standing in the Navy cannot but contrast the cheerless prospect of promotion in the naval service, with the rapid and high distinction to which their military brethren, with equal, but not higher pretensions, have attained.

The naval force, in officers, seamen, and marines, is probably two-fifth parts of the whole military force of the United States, actually employed, in which there are, I think, eight major generals and sixteen brigadiers, exclusive of those of the staff, who enjoy the rank, pay, and emoluments, of brigadiers.

The effect of a limited grade, without hope of promotion, is to contract the range of study and professional attainment within the sphere of the command thus limited. Hold out but the prospect of elevated rank and command, and every officer of talents and worth will aspire to the highest qualifications.

Foreign example is to be received with caution; yet, the practice of nations of great maritime experience may throw some light upon the subject. A comparison of the force of the British navy, with the number of admirals in that service, will exhibit the following result, viz: of ships of seventy-four guns and upwards, there are—

Building, about	-	-	-	-	24
In ordinary, about	-	-	-	-	54
Guards, hospital, prison, store ships, &c.	-	-	-	-	33
In commission, about	-	-	-	-	99
Total	-	-	-	-	210

The list of admirals contains two hundred and nine, exclusive of twenty-seven superannuated rear admirals, upon half-pay; thus exhibiting more than two admirals for every ship of seventy-four guns and upwards, in commission.

We often see on our own coast admirals with commands inferior to those which the American Navy may even now afford.

The new grade to be established, and number of promotions, should be consistent with the scale and character of the Naval Establishment, which may not, for some years, require the distinction of flags as in the British navy, viz: red, white, and blue, at the main, fore, or mizen of each; making nine grades of admirals, rising in the order of the flags, from blue to red.

I am therefore of opinion, that it is now expedient to establish the grade of rear admiral, without any distinction of flags, leaving the promotions to vice-admiral and admiral for future services, and an enlarged establishment.

I am also of opinion, that the same principle which induced the establishment of brevet rank in the Army, for gallant actions, meritorious conduct, or long service, is equally applicable to the Navy, and cannot fail to excite to those actions which it is intended to reward; but no officer so brevetted should be entitled to any additional pay or emoluments, except when commanding on separate service.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, Sir, your obedient servant,

W. JONES.

Hon. C. TAFT, Ch'n Naval Committee, Senate.

THURSDAY January 5.

On motion, by Mr. MORROW,

Resolved, That the committee appointed on the memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing further time for completing the surveys, and obtaining the patents on locations heretofore made under land warrants issued by virtue of resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia, passed prior to the cession of the Northwestern Territory to the United States, as a bounty for military services in the Continental line; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States." They also insist on their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches." They ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill last mentioned, and have appointed managers on their part.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States;" and Mr. MASON submitted an amendment to the bill. On motion, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed.

Mr. BLEDSOE submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the committee on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our naval affairs, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a naval school.

DIRECT TAXES.

The bill entitled "An act to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," was read a third time.

Mr. GORE, of Massachusetts, addressed the Chair as follows—

Mr. President: This bill imposes burdens extremely heavy on all the citizens of our common country, and on those with which I am most acquainted, a load, that, under existing circumstances, will be intolerable.

With the principle of the bill, in selecting as objects of taxation the lands and buildings of the United States, I have no fault to find.

I consider them as fit and proper subjects of revenue, and such assessments calculated to equalize the burdens of the country, as imposing them on all parts, and with more impartiality than can be attained by any other mode.

And, sir, I should feel it my duty to vote for a bill, imposing such a tax, to any reasonable amount, had it not pleased the Government of the nation to place the State, which I have the honor to represent, out of the protection of the United States, and to determine, that while it shall bear a full proportion of the taxes, none of their fruits shall redound to her relief.

The motives of Congress, in granting supplies, are doubtless to provide for the defence of the country and the security of its rights, by a safe and honorable peace.

These motives are wise and irresistible; all concur in the necessity of defending our territory against the enemy; and in the assertion and maintenance of our essential rights, at every peril, and if necessary, by the sacrifice of all that conduces to private ease and personal enjoyment.

No one feels this truth more sensibly than myself—no one considers the duty more imperative. With its obligations I have no compromises to make, and in its performance I ask for no limitations, on account of the folly and improvidence with which the war was waged, nor of the degrading imbecility and prodigal waste of treasure, of blood, and character, by which it has been prosecuted.

The enemy publicly proclaims his purpose, to spread desolation, far and wide, on our unprotected seacoast. He proceeds to execute his threats with a barbarity and baseness, in many instances, unprecedented.

The mansions of the rich, the palaces of the nation, and the cottages of the poorest citizens, feel alike his disgraceful vengeance. The opulence of the wealthy is destroyed; the means of subsistence to the impoverished inhabitants of the sands are redeemed from his rapacity by grinding impositions, which the charity of such as being out of the reach of his power are alone able to supply. Even the ashes of the dead are not suffered to repose in quiet. And, as the last act of atrocity, your slaves are seized and seduced, embodied in military array, and led to the destruction of their masters and the plunder of their possessions.

Whether those acts seek an apology in the conduct of our own Government, we cannot inquire for the purpose of weighing our duty to repel his attack. Whoever comes to our shores, in the character of an enemy, must be resisted. We must do all in our power to defend ourselves and our soil from an invading foe.

A question arises, have we any grounds for believing that the grants of men and money will be wisely applied to the purposes of defence and protection?

Honorable gentlemen will please to go back to November, 1811, when the Executive, in winding its devious course to the fatal act of June 1842, addressed the hopes, the fears, the vanity, and pride of the people, and, avowing its duty to establish the general security, assured the nation "that the works of defence on our maritime frontier had been prosecuted with an activity leaving little to be added for the completion of the most important ones. The land forces so disposed as to insure appropriate and important services, and embodied and marched toward the North-western frontiers," to seek satisfaction for acts, which it was declared, had alike "the character and effect of war."

The subsequent course of things must be full in the mind of every one, and the result known and felt by all.

We learn that the same measures are to be pursued. The Atlantic coast is to be defended as heretofore, by attempts on Canada. This is frankly and formally told to the Congress, that no pretence can be urged, in future, of disappointment or deception.

I forbear to speak on this subject. In the actual state of things, all reasoning must be futile. The powers of language cease before the eloquent monitors constantly in our view.

We are doomed to remain in this scene, that we may not, for a moment, lose sight of our degradation and disgrace.

The Government had complete information of the designs of the enemy, months before his attack on Washington. In this city, were all the means of defence, fortresses, ships, cannon, men, and money; here, too, was concentrated all the wisdom of the Administration, to deliberate, examine, decide, and prepare for the support of the Capitol, at least sixty days prior to its destruction, by a few thousand worn down and exhausted soldiers. You have now in full view, the effect of their combined councils—of their individual and united talents, prudence, and energies.

These monuments show, in characters not to be mistaken, the future in the past, and the desolation around. They declare the fate of every place, under the influence and protection of our Government, if approached by the enemy.

Congress continues to grant, with no sparing hand, supplies of every kind to the same men, in the hope, it is imagined, that Heaven may, by some miracle, interpose for their application to the safety and relief of the country.

Permit me, sir, to crave your indulgence, and that of the honorable Senate, while I relate the condition of the country which I represent, as the grounds of the vote I am constrained to give on this occasion. The State of Massachusetts has a seacoast of about six hundred miles in extent. Its Eastern boundary joins that of the enemy. It is, of course, peculiarly liable to invasion. The President of the United States was avowedly of the opinion that it would be invaded immediately on the commencement of the war. There were several islands, and one of great importance, on the Eastern frontier, the title to which was not definitively acknowledged by Great Britain. The claim of Massachusetts had been allowed, by this Power, in a treaty made according to the instructions of the President, which treaty the United States had chosen to reject. The Government, therefore, superadded to the general obligation enjoined upon it, to protect and defend the territory of all the States, had incurred a peculiar responsibility to guard this particular frontier from falling into the hands of the enemy.

This State has been left entirely unprotected and defenceless, and has at no time had within it, and destined to its defence, sufficient force of the United States, to protect any one point against a common and ordinary hostile attack.

Shortly after the adoption of the Constitution she ceded to the United States all the fortresses in her possession. These, with all the prominent points of land and sites, appropriate for fortifications to defend the State against invasion, were, and for a long time previous to the war had been, in the exclusive possession of the United States. The State, therefore, had no authority or jurisdiction over, nor even to enter them, for any purpose; much less to assume the defence of their territory, through these means.

One great and principal object of the Constitution was to provide by this Government for the common defence, and, by the power and resources of all the States, to protect each against invasion.

The preamble declares: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic

SENATE.

'tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution." For this end, the States surrendered the principal sources of revenue, over which they, previously, had uncontrolled dominion.

"The Congress shall have power—to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence," "to borrow money on the credit of the United States."

Here are ample resources, and means commensurate to the duties the United States were enjoined and undertook to perform.

This cannot be denied by the men now in power; for they abolished many taxes, in full and productive operation, at the time they received the Government.

Power was also granted to raise and support every kind of force necessary to insure the common defence, and to protect the States against invasion, viz: "To raise and support armies." "To provide and maintain a Navy." To exercise exclusive legislation over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislatures of the States in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings."

The several States, having surrendered their own resources, and afforded such ample provision for the common defence, left no doubt of the paramount duty in the United States to perform it punctually and faithfully.

In the present war, they are without excuse, if this be not fully and perfectly done; for the war was of their own choice; they made it, and at their own time.

The several States received from the United States a solemn obligation, that they would protect each against invasion. "The United States guarantee to every State a Republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion."

If anything were wanting to show the sacredness of this duty in the United States, and the absolute reliance which the States entertained of its complete performance, it is to be found in the restrictions and privations which the several States imposed on themselves.

"No State shall grant letters of marque and reprisal. No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts, or duties on imports or exports," except, &c. "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war, in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in a war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

Having thus surrendered all the pecuniary resources, necessary to provide the means of defence, and also the right to raise a force requisite to this end, the several States did rely, and were justified in relying, with perfect confidence, for complete protection and defence, on the Government of the United States.

No one will pretend that such defence has been afforded to all the States in the Union. Massachusetts has been entirely abandoned. The men raised there for the regular Army have been marched out of the State.

Within a month after the declaration of war, the Governor of that State was informed, by direction of the President, that the regular troops were all ordered from the seacoast; and his threat, if intended as such, was instantly executed. Thus, the moment the United States had placed the country in a situation to require defence, and which it was their duty to provide, they wantonly took away the only force which could afford it.

It may be said, that the President called forth the militia, in June and July, 1812, for the purpose of making the defence, and protecting the State against invasion, and the Governor refused to obey the requisition. On the 12th June, 1812, the President, by his Secretary of War, requested Governor Strong to order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of General Dearborn, such parts of the militia as the General might deem necessary for the defence of the seacoast; and, on the 22d June, the same General informed the Governor that war was declared against Great Britain, and requested forty-one companies for the defence of the ports and harbors in Massachusetts, and the harbor of Newport, in Rhode Island.

The Governor of a State is obliged to comply with every requisition of the United States for militia, made in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution. He is equally bound, by his duty to the States, to refrain from calling them forth for purposes not within these provisions.

The only cases which authorize a call for the militia of the several States, to act against an enemy, is to repel invasion.

The President, neither by himself nor any of his officers, ever pretended that this case existed, at the time the requisition was issued. The requisition was made expressly for the defence of the ports and harbors of that State and of Rhode Island.

The militia is a force which belongs to the several States respectively and exclusively, and is so recognised by the Constitution of the United States. The Government of the United States is a Government of limited authorities, and has no other powers than what are granted by the Constitution. A power to call forth the militia to provide for the common defence, or to protect against invasion, is nowhere granted to the United States in express terms. All the authority over the militia delegated to the United States, is to call them forth to repel invasion, to execute the laws, and to suppress insurrection. The United States are bound to provide for the common defence.

To repel invasion is included in the duty of providing for the common defence; and as invasion may be sudden, even in time of profound peace, and before the United States can bring their forces to meet an unexpected attack, the militia of the several States is granted to the United States, from the necessity of the case, as the means by which they may provide for the common defence in such particular instance.

If the United States have authority to call forth the militia, for the ordinary purposes of war, for the common defence, or for protection against invasion, under any of the general powers granted, such as that to provide for the common defence, there would have been no necessity for the special clause authorizing Congress to provide for calling them forth, to repel invasion; for repelling invasion is undoubtedly one part of the duty of providing for the common defence.

If it were the intent of the Constitution to grant to the United States, expressly, a power over the militia for protection against invasion, it would have declared that for such purposes the United States might call forth the militia, or it would have said, to protect against, or repel invasion. And especially in the clause which enjoins on the United States the duty of protecting each State against invasion, the Constitution would have declared, and that, for this purpose, the United States shall call forth the militia. No such words, no such grants, are made in this instrument. If, therefore, the authority of the United States to call forth the militia, to protect the ports and harbors of a State, be granted, it must be by the terms to repel invasion. Common defence includes all the means by which a nation may be guarded, protected, defended, and secured against danger, both in war and in peace.

To repel invasion, is only one particular and specific act providing for the common defence. It is contrary to common sense, as well as to all the rules of logic, to say that a specific power or duty includes the general power, or duty, of which it is a part; it is to say, that a part contains the whole.

To repel invasion, is to drive back and resist that which has already happened. To protect against invasion is to prevent its happening, to secure against its existence. The one act is against an event that has occurred—the other is to insure and guard against the occurrence of such an event.

To protect against invasion, is to erect fortresses, to have them well manned, and supplied with all requisite stores, to provide and equip ships of war, to have an army and navy well organized and disciplined, in peace and in war. To repel invasion is one specific act of war, against another act of the like character.

To repel invasion is one part of the duty of providing for the common defence, and for this part a particular force is granted. To say that a grant of this force, for this special service, includes a grant of the same force for the purposes of protection and defence, is to say, that a grant for one purpose is a grant for another, and for every purpose, and that the grant of a limited, is the grant of a general authority. This would be both illogical and irrational. And if under the limitations, which were intended to control the powers granted to the Government of the United States, and especially under the express limitation, viz: "that powers not delegated to the United States, by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, or to the people," such construction may be adopted, there remains no security for any right reserved to the States, or to the people.

However conclusive this reasoning may be, it is not to be presumed that, after the strides of power in which the spirit of party has indulged, it will have any effect on those who direct the affairs of this country. I will, sir, however, refer to opinions and authorities in confirmation of what has been advanced, that to many gentlemen did not formally admit either of exception or appeal.

These are to be found in the resolutions and arguments of the Legislature of Virginia, and of Mr. Madison, one of that Legislature, in the years 1799 and 1800—I refer the Senate to the third resolution passed by that body, and framed by the pen of the President, in the words following:

"3, Resolved, That this Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact to which the States are parties, submitted by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that contract; and that in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have a right and are in duty bound to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them."

"It is said, that Congress are, by the Constitution, to protect each State against invasion, and that the means of preventing, are included in the power of protection against it."

"The power of war in general having been before granted by the Constitution, this clause must either be a mere specification, for greater caution and certainty, of which there are other examples in the Constitution, or be the injunction of a duty, superadded to a grant of power. Under either explanation, it cannot enlarge the powers of Congress on the subject. The power and duty to protect each State against an invading enemy would be the same, under the general powers, if this regard to greater caution had been omitted."

"Invasion is an operation of war. To protect against invasion is an exercise of the power of war. A power, therefore, not incident to war, cannot be incident to a particular modification of war. And as the removal of alien friends has appeared to be no incident to a general state of war, it cannot be incident to a partial state, or to a particular modification of war."

"Nor, can it ever be granted, that a power to act on a case, when it actually occurs, includes a power over all the means that may tend to prevent the occurrence of the case. Such a latitude of construction would render unavailing every practicable definition of limited powers."—[See proceedings in the House of Delegates, of Virginia, on the 7th January, 1800, on the resolutions of the General Assembly of December 21, 1798.]

founded in truth, and justified by the Constitution, the following positions are established, viz:

That the United States have no right to call on the several States for the militia, to perform any act of war, but to repel invasion.

That to defend the ports and harbors of Massachusetts and Rhode Island; the purpose for which the militia was required in 1812, is not within the power delegated by the Constitution, to provide for calling forth the militia to repel invasion.

In the case alluded to in 1812, it was not declared by the President, nor even pretended by his officers, that any invasion was made. In fact, no invasion was attempted until two years after this time. If the United States had no authority to make the requisition, the Governor would have betrayed his duty to the State, in complying with the demand.

That the United States had no such authority, I think evident from the examination that has been made of the powers delegated by the Constitution. And the State of Massachusetts, instead of being a just object of censure, by the United States, has a well founded complaint against their Government, for an attempt to usurp her rights and invade her prerogatives.

A question has sometimes been suggested, whether the Governor of a State has a right to judge if the requisition be within the provisions of the Constitution. A little reflection on the nature of the Government of the United States, and of a State, and of the relation in which the Supreme Executive of the latter stands to the United States, and to the citizens of his particular State, will show that he is obliged to examine, if the case for which the requisition is made be within the provisions of the Constitution, and if the purposes for which it is declared are manifestly not within the powers delegated by that instrument, to withhold a compliance.

The Government of the United States can exercise no powers not granted by the Constitution, and so far as this Government can support such as it claims on this charter, it is sovereign, and has no other control than its own discretion.

The government of the several States is equally sovereign, with respect to every power of an independent State, which it has not delegated by the same instrument to the United States, or which is not thereby prohibited to the several States. It is, also, a sacred duty of the Government of the several States, to preserve unimpaired every right and authority retained by the State, either in its corporate capacity or for its individual citizens. Whether the militia, the peculiar force of the several States, and that which is to protect and defend every right and power they possess, is called forth by the United States according to the provisions which they made, in delegating to this Government its powers, must of necessity be a question between two sovereign independent Governments, and on which there is no tribunal authorized to judge between them. And if the Governors, who are commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States, should surrender this force to the United States, in a case not authorized by the Constitution, they would betray the trust confided to them by the citizens of their States. They must, therefore, examine the case when called upon, and decide according to their duty, as prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and that of their particular State, shall demand.

General Cushing, while superintendent of the military district in which Massachusetts is situated, informed Governor Strong, that he expected an order from the President of the United States, to request a detachment of militia for the defence of the seacoast, and particularly of Boston. That he had not more troops than sufficient to man one of the forts, and proposed that one should be occupied by the militia, and that, while out, they should be subject to the command of no officer of the United States, except the superintendent of the district. The Governor acceded to the proposal.

General Dearborn shortly after superseded General Cushing, and on the 8th July, by order of the President, and in confirmation of the expectation of Brigadier General Cushing, requested a detachment of eleven hundred militia to occupy the forts and harbor of Boston.

Governor Strong, although under no Constitutional obligation to call forth the militia for the purposes required, yet, seeing the forlorn condition of the country, the vast property of the United States in the navy yard, a ship-of-the-line nearly completed, and a frigate, all abandoned by the Government to the mercy of the enemy, at the same time that these offered to him great temptations to attack and destroy the capital of the State and its environs, and feeling authorized by the resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts, detached the militia, in confidence that the agreement made with General Cushing would be fulfilled.

At the end of their term of service these men were offered an uncurrent and depreciated paper, as their only compensation.

In the beginning of September, General Dearborn notified the Governor that the enemy had taken possession of a considerable part of the State of Massachusetts, and requested a detachment of the militia for the purpose of protecting and defending such parts of that State, and New Hampshire, as were not in the occupation of the enemy.

Such complaints and objections had arisen in executing the order of July, that the Governor, although he issued an order for troops, found himself obliged to place the detachment under the command of a major general of the militia.

The Governor immediately addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, requesting to know from the President if the expenses, thus necessarily incurred for the protection of the State, would be ultimately reimbursed to that State by the United States.

The answer was, that if the force thus put into service by the Governor had been required by General Dearborn, or received by him, and put under his command, the expenses attending it would be defrayed by the United States. If otherwise, in either of these particulars, the United States were not chargeable with the expense.

Here is a distinct and plain case, in which the United States had neglected that protection which they were expressly bound to afford the State, and thereby occasioned the loss of a fifth part of its territory;* and then called upon the State itself to protect the remaining territory. The State obeyed the call, and reserved only that right which the Constitution, in express terms, reserved, viz: the appointment of officers to command the militia required; and the United States say this expense must be borne by the State, and that they will not reimburse the amount, because the militia is not placed under the command of an officer of the United States.†

For this act of injustice, for this neglect of duty in the United States towards the State of Massachusetts, for this abandonment of its territory to the violence of the enemy, I have never heard the smallest apology.

I forbear to mention the rights of the State, the necessity to which this wanton abandonment by those who ought to protect them may reduce the inhabitants. The laws of self-preservation, and of nature, confirmed by that of nations, afford the rule for any member of a confederacy thus deserted and forsaken,

I most earnestly hope, that although cruelly deserted by the Government, which contrary to their entreaties brought them into this perilous condition, that citizens of the country may be able to defend themselves. They will do all that men can do under their circumstances. But I am confident, that if this tax be collected there, and paid into the Treasury of the United States, for the exclusive support and defence of others, they will be destitute of the means of making any adequate resistance. I cannot, therefore, vote for this bill.

The present year the Commonwealth has expended more than $700,000 in her own defence. She is now called on by this bill for $632,041, to defend other parts of the territory of the United States; and her citizens, more exposed than any other, are left to provide for their own defence.

They who calculated on the ability of Massachusetts to pay, from the exactness and punctuality which she has heretofore observed in the discharge of taxes, will recollect, that her faculty to meet the demands of the Treasury, even in times the most prosperous, arose principally from the daring enterprise, unrivalled industry, and rigid economy of the inhabitants; that her resources are now annihilated, and she is borne down by obloquy, insult, and oppression.

They who have observed the patience wherewith she has submitted to see the public treasure squandered, to purchase slanders against her citizens, and notwithstanding a complete failure by the full confession of the hireling, that these citizens were so far beyond all temptation as not even to be approached for dishonorable purposes, has been subjected to the most degrading insinuations, from the first authority; who have witnessed all the resources of her wealth, all the means of her industry, the object of unabating persecution from the Government, and her possessions coldly and expressly abandoned, by the same authority, to the depredations and seizure of the enemy, may conceive that taxes like these will still be paid for the exclusive protection of others; but if gentlemen will only condescend to view the people of this country as their brethren, as freemen, as men, they must come to the conclusion, that, had they the means, they could not possibly have the will.

* There were, at the attack and capture of Castine, twenty-eight men and a Lieutenant in the fort. This was all the protection for one of the most important harbors and rivers of the United States, and affording the best situation for a naval depot for Great Britain.

† In the military district, No. 1, which includes New Hampshire and Massachusetts, there were less than one thousand three hundred men. These were scattered over an extensive tract of country. In the forts, in Boston harbor, there were not two hundred and sixty men, and in the other forts in the State a very small corps, inadequate to any defence. There was, however, a Major General, a Brigadier General, and several Colonels. In no one place were there men enough to constitute a colonel's command.

They insist on their amendments to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States."

discharged from the further consideration thereof, and they were referred to the said committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. THOMPSON presented several petitions, signed by a number of the inhabitants of the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the transportation and opening of the mail on the Sabbath; and the petitions were read, and referred to the committee to whom were referred, the 26th ultimo, several petitions on the same subject, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the conference proposed on the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States," and have appointed managers on their part. They have passed the bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory,' with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They agree to some, and disagree to other amendments of the Senate to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America."

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the message from the House announcing its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America."

[The state of this question is so intricately interwoven with matters of form and technicalities, that we shall, in describing the questions which came up to-day, disregard the mere form of them, and endeavor to present the substance.]

The first question was the proposition sent from the Senate, to which the House has disagreed, to increase the capital of the bank five millions, to be subscribable in public stock, created since the war.

On this proposition, Mr. BIBB proposed to insist.

This motion was supported by Mr. BIBB, Mr. SMITH, Mr. ROBERTS, and Mr. TAYLOR, and opposed by Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. KING, and Mr. GILES. The able debate turned principally on the merits of the specie payment suspending section, (to which also the other House had disagreed,) which was considered as intimately connected with the question immediately before the Senate.

The first named gentlemen insisted on the advantages to the Government from the increase of the capital, and also from the proposed power to suspend payment in specie, without which, it was said, the operations of the bank must, for some time at least, be greatly restricted, &c., and wholly useless to the Government. Mr. BIBB, Mr. ROBERTS, and Mr. TAYLOR, intimated, if the Senate should yield these points to the House, that they should vote for the indefinite postponement of the bill, under the impression that it would be rather an injury than a benefit to the community to pass it in its present shape.

Messrs. BARBOUR, KING, and GILES, urged the recession of the Senate from these amendments, principally on the ground of necessary concession (although the two latter gentlemen objected to them on principle also)—concessions which it was said the times now more than ever demand. Mr. BARBOUR, particularly, in an eloquent manner enforced the necessity of acting decisively on a subject which had so long been pending between the two Houses, and so greatly interested the feelings of the community, which turned its eyes with ceaseless anxiety on the dilatory proceedings of Congress. Mr. SMITH, in allusion to these remarks, took occasion to absolve the Executive and Senate from the blame of delay and apathy, and by inference to cast it on the shoulders of the House of Representatives.

The question being about to be taken, Mr. ROBERTS moved to postpone the subject till to-morrow, with the view of submitting a resolution that Mr. BLEDSOE (the Kentucky Senator) was entitled to a seat in the Senate, inasmuch as the election of his successor, Mr. TALBOT, had not yet been notified to the Senate. This motion was negatived, 25 to 9, by yeas and nays.

The question to insist on the first amendment, as stated above, was then decided as follows:

For insisting—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Chace, Condit, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Walker—13.

Against insisting—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lambert, Mason, Robinson, Tait, Thompson, Wells, and Wharton—21.

So the Senate refused to insist on this amendment.

Mr. GILES moved to recede from the said amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS then moved to postpone the further consideration of the whole subject to the second Monday in March (equivalent to a motion to reject.) In support of the motion, Mr. ROBERTS spoke at some length.

Mr. BIBB intimated that he should vote against the postponement now, because the amendment respecting which he was most anxious had not been decided (meaning the section respecting specie payments.)

Mr. TAYLOR said he should vote for the postponement, because he perceived the amendment referred to by Mr. BIBB would not be insisted on.

The question on the postponement (or rejection) was then decided as follows:

For the postponement—Messrs. Gaillard, German, Kerr, Lacock, Lambert, Roberts, Taylor, Turner, and Varnum—9.

Against the postponement—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Bibb, Brown, Chace, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Thompson, Walker, Wells, and Wharton—25.

The question on Mr. GILES'S motion, to recede from the said first amendment, was then decided in the affirmative—ayes 18.

Mr. KING then moved to recede from all the other amendments to which the House had disagreed.

The Senate then receded from such of the said remaining amendments, as preceded the following:

The question on receding from the insertion of the section, authorizing the bank under certain circumstances, to suspend payment of their notes in specie, was decided as follows:

For receding—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, and Wells—18.

Against receding—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Chace, Condit, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, and Wharton—16.

So the Senate virtually disagreed to the insertion of such a section. Whereupon,

Mr. BIBB moved to postpone to the second Monday in March (to reject) the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. SMITH then, expressing a desire to have a night's reflection on this question, moved to adjourn.

There were 49 ayes in favor of the motion; and the Senate adjourned at a late hour.

FRIDAY, January 20.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting the sums respectively paid to each clerk in the several offices of that Department, for services rendered during the year 1814, made in obedience to the provisions of the act of April 21, 1806, to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks; and the report was read.

Mr. VARNUM, from the Militia Committee, to whom the subject was referred the 9th instant, reported a bill concerning field officers and militia; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Honorable Mr. BLEDSOE, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1815.

SIR: Doubts having arisen whether I have a right still to fill my seat in the Senate of the United States, with a view to have the question settled, and a precedent established, and to save my own feelings on a point of duty, I beg leave, through you, to submit the following case for the decision of that honorable body:

Previous to the 21th December last, I forwarded, by mail, my resignation to the Governor of the State of Kentucky, to take place on that day, to be by him communicated to the Legislature of that State, then, and, so far as I am informed, still in session. I was, by a letter from the Governor of that State, advised that he had received my resignation, and would hold it up in the hope of hearing from me, and of a change in my determination on that subject, until about the last of that month, when he would communicate it to the Legislature. Newspaper information states that he did so, and that my successor has been appointed; which latter fact is also stated in a letter to a gentleman of the House of Representatives, as I have been informed. This is all the information I have received. Whether, under these circumstances, I am to be considered as still a member, will be for the honorable Senate to decide. Wishing it to be understood I have no other solicitude as to the result than to be informed of my duty, which is concerned, in continuing in my place, if I have a right to do so,

I am, with high respect, your most obedient servant,
J. BLEDSOE.

The Honorable JOHN GAILLARD,
President of the Senate.

And the letter was read. Whereupon, Mr. ROBERTS submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the facts stated in the letter of the Honorable Jesse Bledsoe, addressed to the President of the Senate, do not vacate his seat in the Senate.

A motion was made, by Mr. KING, to amend the resolution, by striking out therefrom, the word "not;" and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 8, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Condit, Dana, Lacock, Roberts, Smith, Turner, and Varnum.

On the question, Shall the resolution pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lacock, Lambert, Mason, Morrow, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Turner, Wells, and Wharton.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Condit, Dana, Roberts, Smith, and Varnum.

So it was, Resolved, That the facts stated in the letter of the Honorable JESSE BLEDSOE, addressed to the President of the Senate, do vacate his seat in the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Benjamin Wells and others;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Brahany;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the better regulation of the ordinance department;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of their amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America."

On the question, that the said bill, together with the amendments, be postponed to the second Monday in March next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Condit, Gaillard, Howell, Kerr, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Walker.

Resolved, That the Senate recede from their amendments to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, to which the said House have disagreed; and that they recede from their disagreement to, and concur in, all the other amendments of the House of Representatives thereto.

Mr. BROWN, from the managers appointed on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States," reported:

"That they have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses a modification of the first amendment of the Senate, in lieu of the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives, by adding the following proviso, at the end of the first section:

"And be it further provided, That, in case the President of the United States shall hereafter call on the Executives of the several States to hold in readiness their respective quotas of militia for service, he shall consider the corps of State troops raised in any State, as part of the quota of such State.

"And in lieu of the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives to the 5th section, to modify the 5th section as proposed by the Senate, by striking out the word "forty," in the 12th line, and inserting the word "seventy."

And be it further enacted, That if any suit or prosecution be commenced in any State court, against any collector, naval officer, surveyor, inspector, or any other officer, civil or military, or any other person aiding or assisting, agreeable to the provisions of this act, for anything done, or omitted to be done, as an officer of the customs, or for anything done by virtue of this act, and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in such court, file a petition for the removal of the cause for trial at the next circuit court to be holden in the district where the suit is pending, and offer good and sufficient surety for his entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of said process against him, and also for his there appearing at the court and entering special bail in the cause, if special bail was originally required therein, it shall then be the duty of the State court to accept the surety, and proceed no further in the cause, and the bail that shall have been originally taken, shall be discharged, and such copies being entered as aforesaid in such court of the United States, the cause shall there proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process, whatever may be the amount of the sum in dispute or damages claimed, or whatever the citizenship of the parties, any former law to the contrary notwithstanding. And any attachment of the goods or estate of the defendant, by the original process, shall hold the goods or estate so attached to answer the final judgment, in the same manner as by the laws of such State they would have been holden to answer final judgment, had it been rendered by the court in which the suit was commenced. And it shall be lawful, in any action or prosecution which may be now pending, or hereafter commenced, before any State court whatever, for anything done, or omitted to be done, by the defendant, as an inspector or other officer of the customs, after final judgment, for either party to remove and transfer, by appeal, such decision, during the session or term of said court, at which the same shall have taken place, from such court to the next circuit court of the United States, to be held in the district in which such appeal shall be taken in manner aforesaid; and it shall be the duty of the person taking such appeal and transfer, to produce and enter in the said circuit court, attested copies of the process, proceedings, and judgment, in such cause; and it shall also be competent for either party, within six months of the rendition of a judgment in any such cause, by writ of error or other process, to remove the same to the circuit court of the United States of that district in which such judgment shall have been rendered; and the said circuit court shall, thereupon, proceed to try and determine the facts and the law in such action, in the same manner as if the same had been there originally commenced; the judgment in such case notwithstanding. And any bail which may have been taken, or property attached, shall be holden on the final judgment of the said circuit court in such action, in the same manner as if no such removal and transfer had been made as aforesaid; and the State court from which any such action may be removed and transferred as aforesaid, upon the parties giving good and sufficient security for the prosecution thereof, shall allow the same to be removed and transferred, and proceed no further in the case: Provided, however, That if the party aforesaid shall fail duly to enter the removal and transfer as aforesaid in the circuit court, agreeable to this act, the State court, by which judgment shall have been rendered, and from which the transfer and removal shall have been made as aforesaid, shall be authorized, on motion for that purpose, to issue execution, and to carry into effect any such judgment, the same as if no such removal and transfer had been made: Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any prosecution for an offence involving corporal punishment: And, provided also, That no such appeal shall be allowed in any criminal action or prosecution, where final judgment shall have been rendered in favor of the defendant, or respondent, by the State court; and in any action or prosecution against any person as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such person to plead the general issue, and give this act and any special matter in evidence. And if, in any such suit, the plaintiff is nonsuit, or judgment pass against him, the defendant shall recover double costs."

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

Having bestowed on the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," that full consideration which is due to the great importance of the subject, and dictated by the respect which I feel for the two Houses of Congress, I am constrained, by a deep and solemn conviction that the bill ought not to become a law, to return it to the Senate, in which it originated, with my objections to the same.

Waiving the question of the Constitutional authority of the Legislature to establish an incorporated bank, as being precluded, in my judgment, by repeated recognitions, under varied circumstances, of the validity of such an institution, in acts of the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial branches of the Government, accompanied by indications, in different modes, of a concurrence of the general will of the nation; the proposed bank does not appear to be calculated to answer the purposes of reviving the public credit, of providing a national medium of circulation, and of aiding the Treasury by facilitating the indispensable anticipations of the revenue, and by affording to the public more durable loans.

1. The capital of the bank is to be compounded of specie, of public stock, and of Treasury notes convertible into stock, with a certain proportion of each of which every subscriber is to furnish himself.

The amount of the stock to be subscribed will not, it is believed, be sufficient to produce, in favor of the public credit, any considerable or lasting elevation of the market price, whilst this may be occasionally depressed by the bank itself, if it should carry into the market the allowed proportion of its capital consisting of public stock, in order to procure specie, which it may find its account in procuring, with some sacrifice on that part of its capital.

Nor will any adequate advantage arise to the public credit from the subscription of Treasury notes. The actual issue of these notes nearly equals at present, and will soon exceed, the amount to be subscribed to the bank. The direct effect of this operation is simply to convert fifteen millions of Treasury notes into fifteen millions of six per cent. stock, with the collateral effect of promoting an additional demand for Treasury notes, beyond what might otherwise be negotiable.

Public credit might indeed be expected to derive advantage from the establishment of a National Bank, without regard to the formation of its capital, if the full aid and co-operation of the institution were secured to the Government during the war, and during the period of its fiscal embarrassments. But, the bank proposed will be free from all legal obligation to co-operate with the public measures; and whatever might be the patriotic disposition of its directors to contribute to the removal of those embarrassments, and to invigorate the prosecution of the war, fidelity to the pecuniary and general interest of the institution, according to their estimate of it, might oblige them to decline a connexion of their operations with those of the National Treasury, during the continuance of the war and the difficulties incident to it. Temporary sacrifices of interest, though overbalanced by the future and permanent profits of the charter, not being requirable of right in behalf of the public, might not be gratuitously made, and the bank would reap the full benefit of the grant, whilst the public would lose the equivalent expected from it. For it must be kept in view, that the sole inducement to such a grant, on the part of the public, would be the prospect of substantial aids to its pecuniary means at the present crisis, and during the sequel of the war. It is evident that the stock of the bank will, on the return of peace, if not sooner, rise in the market to a value which, if the bank were established in a period of peace, would authorize and obtain for the public a bonus to a very large amount. In lieu of such a bonus the Government is fairly entitled to, and ought not to relinquish or risk, the needful services of the bank, under the pressing circumstances of war.

2. The bank, as proposed to be constituted, cannot be relied on during the war, to provide a circulating medium, nor to furnish loans, or anticipations of the public revenue.

Without a medium, the taxes cannot be collected; and, in the absence of specie, the medium understood to be the best substitute is that of notes issued by a National Bank. The proposed bank will commence and conduct its operations under an obligation to pay its notes in specie, or be subject to the loss of its charter. Without such an obligation, the notes of the bank, though not exchangeable for specie, yet resting on good pledges, and performing the uses of specie, in the payment of taxes, and in other public transactions, would, as experience has ascertained, qualify the bank to supply at once a circulating medium, and pecuniary aids to the Government. Under the fetters imposed by the bill, it is manifest that, during the actual state of things, and probably during the war, the period particularly requiring such a medium and such a resource for loans and advances to the Government, notes for which the bank would be compellable to give specie in exchange could not be kept in circulation. The most the bank could effect, and the most it could be expected to aim at, would be to keep the institution alive by limited and local transactions, which, with the interest on the public stock in the bank, might yield a dividend sufficient for the purpose, until a change from war to peace should enable it, by a flow of specie into its vaults, and a removal of the external demand for it, to derive its contemplated emoluments from a safe and full extension of its operations.

On the whole, when it is considered that the proposed establishment will enjoy a monopoly of the profits of a National bank for a period of twenty years; that the monopolized profits will be continually growing, with the progress of the national population and wealth; that the nation will, during the same period, be dependent on the notes of the bank for that species of circulating medium, whenever the precious metals may be wanted, and at all times for so much thereof as may be an eligible substitute for a specie medium; and that the extensive employment of the notes in the collection of the augmented taxes will, moreover, enable the bank greatly to extend its profitable issues of them, without the expense of specie capital to support their circulation; it is as reasonable as it is requisite, that the Government, in return for these extraordinary concessions to the bank, should have a greater security for attaining the public objects of the institution than is presented in the bill, and particularly for every practicable accommodation, both in the temporary advances necessary to anticipate the taxes, and in those more durable loans which are equally necessary to diminish the resort to taxes.

In discharging this painful duty of stating objections to a measure which has undergone the deliberations and received the sanction of the two Houses of the National Legislature, I console myself with the reflection that, if they have not the weight which I attach to them, they can be constitutionally overruled; and with a confidence that, in a contrary event, the wisdom of Congress will hasten to substitute a more commensurate and certain provision for the public exigencies.

JAMES MADISON.

And, in case of the death, or refusal to serve, of any of the commissioners aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to supply the vacancy or vacancies thus created, by appointing some suitable person or persons.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person, copartnership, or body politic, to subscribe for so many shares of the said capital stock of the said bank, as he or they shall think fit, not exceeding three thousand shares, except as is hereinafter provided for the subscription on behalf of the United States, and the sums respectively subscribed, except on behalf of the United States, as is hereinafter provided, shall be payable in the manner following, that is to say: five millions of dollars thereof in gold or silver coin of the United States, or of foreign coin at the value heretofore established by the act of Congress, entitled "An act regulating the currency of foreign coins," passed the 10th day of April, one thousand eight hundred and six; ten millions of dollars thereof in gold or silver coin, as aforesaid, or in the public debt of the United States, contracted by virtue of the act of Congress, entitled "An act authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding eleven millions of dollars," passed the fourteenth day of March one thousand eight hundred and twelve, or contracted, or to be contracted, by virtue of any subsequent act and acts of Congress heretofore passed, authorizing a loan or loans; and fifteen millions of dollars thereof in gold and silver coin, or in Treasury notes, issued under the act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing notes," passed the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, or issued under the authority of any subsequent act or acts of Congress, authorizing, or which shall authorize, Treasury notes to be issued, previously to the final closing of the subscriptions to the said bank. And the said payment shall be made and completed in the sums and at the times hereinafter declared, that is to say: at the time of subscribing there shall be paid six dollars and sixty-six cents and two thirds of a cent on each share, in gold or silver coin; twenty dollars in the Treasury notes aforesaid; and thirteen dollars thirty-three cents and one-third of a cent in the public debt of the United States, contracted or to be contracted, as aforesaid: at the expiration of four calendar months after the time of subscribing there shall be paid the further sum of three dollars thirty-three cents and one third of a cent on each share, in gold or silver coin; ten dollars in the Treasury notes aforesaid; and six dollars sixty-six cents and two-thirds of a cent in the public debt of the United States, contracted or to be contracted as aforesaid: at the expiration of six calendar months from the time of subscribing there shall be paid the further sum of three dollars thirty-three cents and one third of a cent on each share, in gold or silver coin; ten dollars in the Treasury notes aforesaid; and six dollars sixty-six cents and two-thirds of a cent in the public debt of the United States, contracted, or to be contracted, as aforesaid: at the expiration of eight calendar months from the time of subscribing there shall be paid the further sum of three dollars thirty-three cents and one-third of a cent, in gold or silver coin; ten dollars in the Treasury notes aforesaid; and six dollars sixty-six cents and two-thirds of a cent in the public debt of the United States, contracted, or to be contracted, as aforesaid. And the subscriptions in public stock and Treasury notes, as aforesaid, shall be taken and credited for the principal and so much of the interest thereof, respectively, as shall have accrued on the day of subscribing the same. And, at the time of subscribing to the capital stock of the said bank, as aforesaid, each and every subscriber shall deliver to the commissioners, at the place of subscribing, as well the specie amount of their subscriptions, respectively, as the certificates of stock for the stock proportion of their subscriptions, respectively, together with a power of attorney authorizing the said commissioners, or a majority of them, to transfer the said stock, in due form of law, to "The President, Directors, and Company, of the said Bank of the United States of America," as soon as the said bank shall be organized; and, also, Treasury notes for the proportion of the subscriptions, respectively, payable in Treasury notes as aforesaid: Provided, always, That if, in consequence of the apportionment of shares in the said bank among the subscribers, in the case and in the manner hereinbefore prescribed, any subscriber shall have delivered to the commissioners, at the time of subscribing, a greater amount of specie, stock, and Treasury notes, than shall be necessary to complete the payments for the share or shares to such subscriber, apportioned as aforesaid, the commissioners shall only retain so much of the said money, stock, and Treasury notes, as shall be necessary to complete such payments, and shall forthwith return, on application for the same, the surplus thereof to the subscriber lawfully entitled thereto. And the commissioners respectively shall deposit the gold and silver, certificates of stock, and Treasury notes, by them respectively received, as aforesaid, from the subscribers to the said bank, in some place of secure and safe keeping, so that the same may and shall be specifically delivered and transferred, as the same were by them respectively received, to the said President, Directors, and Company, of the said Bank of the United States of America, or to their order, as soon as shall be required after the organization of the said bank.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the United States may, at any time before the expiration of this act, in pursuance of any law which may be passed by Congress for that purpose, cause to be subscribed, for

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever and as often as any of the Treasury notes, subscribed as aforesaid, to the said capital stock of the said bank, shall be due and payable, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury (and he is hereby authorized and required) to pay and redeem the same, principal and interest, by causing certificates of public stock for an equal amount, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, and redeemable in any sums, and at any periods, which the Government may deem fit, to be prepared and made in the usual form, and the same to be delivered to the president and directors of the said bank, in satisfaction and discharge of such Treasury notes.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the subscribers to the said Bank of the United States of America, their successors and assigns, shall be, and are hereby created, a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of "The President, Directors, and Company, of the Bank of the United States of America," and shall so continue until the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five; and by that name shall be, and are hereby made, able and capable in law, to have, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain, to them and their successors, lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects, of whatsoever kind, nature, and quality, to an amount not exceeding in the whole thirty-five millions of dollars, including the amount of the capital stock aforesaid; and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien, or dispose of, to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in all courts and places whatsoever; and also to make, have, and use, a common seal, and the same to break, alter, and renew, at their pleasure; and, also, to ordain, establish, and put in execution, such by-laws and ordinances, and regulations, as they shall deem necessary and convenient, for the government of the said corporation, not being contrary to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and generally to do and execute all and singular the acts, matters, and things, which to them it shall or may appertain to do; subject, nevertheless, to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations, and provisions, hereinafter prescribed and declared.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, for the management of the affairs of the said corporation, there shall be twenty-five directors, who shall be elected at the banking house in Philadelphia, on the first Monday of January, in each year, by the stockholders or proprietors of the capital stock of the said corporation, and by a plurality of votes then and there actually given, according to the scale of voting hereinafter prescribed. And the directors, so duly chosen, shall be capable of serving by virtue of such choice, until the end or expiration of the first Monday in January next ensuing the time of such election, and no longer: Provided, always, That the first election and appointment of directors shall be at the time, and for the period, hereinafter declared.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, as soon as the sum of twelve millions of dollars in gold and silver coin, and in the public debt and Treasury notes, shall have been actually received on account of the subscriptions to the said capital stock, (exclusively of the sub-

And the persons who shall be then and there chosen as aforesaid, shall be the first directors, and shall proceed to elect one of their number president of the said corporation, and they shall be capable of serving by virtue of such choice until the end and expiration of the first Monday of January next ensuing the time of making the same, and shall forthwith, thereafter, commence the operations of the said bank, at the said city of Philadelphia: Provided, always, That in case it should at any time happen that an election of directors and president of the said corporation should not be made upon any day when, in pursuance of this act, they ought to be made, the said corporation shall not for that cause be deemed to be dissolved; but it shall be lawful on any other day to hold and make an election of directors and president of the said corporation, (as the case may be,) in such manner as shall have been regulated by the by-laws and ordinances of the said corporation; and until such election be so made, the directors and president, for the time being, shall continue in office; And provided also, That, in case of the death, resignation, or removal of the president of the said corporation, the directors shall proceed to elect another president: And provided also, That in case of the death, resignation, or absence from the United States, or removal of a director from office, the vacancy shall be supplied by the stockholders.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the directors, for the time being, shall have power to appoint such officers, clerks, and servants, under them, as shall be necessary for executing the business of the said corporation, and to allow them such compensation for their services respectively, as shall be reasonable; and shall be capable of exercising such other powers and authorities for the well governing and ordering of the affairs of the said corporation, as shall be prescribed, fixed, and determined, by the laws, regulations, and ordinances of the same.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the following, restrictions, limitations, and provisions, shall form and be fundamental articles of the constitution of the said corporation, to wit:

1. of election. And stockholders actually resident within the United States, and none other, may vote in elections by proxy.

2. Not more than three-fourths of the directors in office, at the time of an annual election, shall be elected for the next succeeding year, and no person shall be a director more than three out of four years; but the director who shall be the president at the time of an election, may always be re-elected.

3. None but a resident citizen of the United States, and holding at the time of his election not less than ten shares, bona fide in his own right, shall be a director; and if any director shall cease to be a stockholder to that amount, he shall cease to be a director.

4. No director shall be entitled to any emolument. The stockholders may make such compensation to the president, for his extraordinary attendance at the bank, as shall appear to them reasonable.

5. Not less than seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business, of whom the president shall always be one, except in case of sickness or necessary absence, in which case his place may be supplied by any other director whom he, by writing, under his hand, shall depute for the purpose. And the director so deputed, may do and transact all the necessary business belonging to the office of the president of the said corporation, during the continuance of the sickness or necessary absence of the president.

6. A number of stockholders not less than sixty, who, together, shall be proprietors of one thousand shares or upwards, shall have power at any time to call a general meeting of the stockholders, for purposes relative to the institution, giving at least ten weeks' notice in two public newspapers of the place where the bank is seated, and specifying in such notice the object or objects of such meeting.

7. Every cashier or treasurer, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall be required to give bond, with two or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the directors, in a sum not less than fifty thousand dollars, with a condition for his good behaviour, and the faithful performance of his duties to the corporation.

8. The lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which it shall be lawful for the said corporation to hold, shall be only requisite for its immediate accommodation in relation to the convenient transacting of its business, and such as shall have been bona fide mortgaged to it by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings, or purchased at sales, upon judgments which shall have been obtained for such debts.

9. The total amount of debts which the said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, over and above the debt or debts due for money deposited in the bank, shall not exceed the sum of thirty millions of dollars, unless the contracting of any greater debt shall have been previously authorized by a law of the United States. In case of excess, the directors under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for the same, in their natural and private capacities, and an action of debt may, in such case, be brought against them, or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors, or administrators, in any court of record of the United States, or either of them, by any creditor or creditors of the said corporation, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, any condition, covenant, or agreement, to the contrary notwithstanding. But this provision shall not be construed to exempt the said corporation, or the lands, tenements, goods, or chattels, of the same, from being also liable for, and chargeable with, the said excess. Such of the said directors who may have been absent when the said excess was contracted or created, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act whereby the same was so contracted or created, may respectively exonerate themselves from being so liable, by forthwith giving notice of the fact, and of their absence or dissent, to the President of the United States, and to the stockholders, at a general meeting, which they shall have power to call for that purpose.

10. The said corporation shall not, directly or indirectly, deal or trade in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent, and not redeemed in due time, or goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands. It shall not be at liberty to purchase any public debt whatsoever; nor shall it take more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum for or upon its loans or discounts.

11. The said corporation shall not, in any one year, sell any portion of the public debt constituting a part of its capital stock aforesaid, to an amount exceeding five millions of dollars, without the consent of Congress.

12. No loan shall be made by the said corporation, for the use, or on account, of the Government of the United States, to an amount exceeding five hundred thousand dollars; or any particular State, to an amount exceeding fifty thousand dollars; or to any foreign Prince or State, unless previously authorized by a law of the United States.

13. The stock of the said corporation shall be assignable and transferable according to such rules as shall be instituted in that behalf, by the laws and ordinances of the same.

14. The bills obligatory and of credit, under the seal of the said corporation, which shall be made to any person or persons, shall be assignable by endorsement thereupon, under the hand or hands of such person or persons, and his, her, or their executors or administrators, and of his, her, or their assignee or assignees, and the executors or administrators of such assignee or assignees, and so as absolutely to transfer and vest the property thereof in each and every assignee or assignees, successively, and to enable such assignee or assignees, and his, her, or their executors or administrators, to maintain an action thereupon in his, her, or their own name or names. And the bills or notes which may be issued by order of the said corporation, signed by the president and countersigned by the principal cashier or treasurer thereof, promising the payment of money to any person or persons, his, her, or their order, or to bearer, although not under the seal of the said corporation, shall be binding and obligatory upon the same, in the like manner, and with the like force and effect, as upon any private person or persons, if issued by him, her, or them, in his, her, or their private or natural capacity or capacities, and shall be assignable and negotiable in like manner as if they were so issued by such private person or persons; that is so say: those which shall be payable to any person or persons, his, her, or their order, shall be assignable by endorsement, in like manner, and with the like effect, as foreign bills of exchange now are; and those which are payable to bearer shall be assignable and negotiable by delivery only.

15. Half yearly dividends shall be made of so much of the profits of the bank as shall appear to the directors advisable; and once in every three years, the directors shall lay before the stockholders, at a general meeting, for their information, an exact and particular statement of the debts which have remained unpaid after the expiration of the original credit, for a period of treble the term of that credit, and of the surplus of profits, if any, after deducting losses and dividends. If there shall be a failure in the payment of any part of any sum subscribed by any person, copartnership, or body politic, the party failing shall lose the benefit of any dividend which may have accrued prior to the time for making such payment, and during the delay of the same.

16. The directors of said corporation shall be bound to establish a competent office of discount and deposit in the District of Columbia, whenever any law of the United States shall require such establishment; and it shall be lawful for the said directors to establish offices wheresoever they shall think fit, within the United States or the Territories thereof, for the purposes of discount, deposit, and distribution; or for the purposes of deposit and distribution only; and upon the same terms, and in the same manner, as shall be practised at the bank; and to commit the management of the said offices, and the business thereof respectively, to such persons, and under such regulations, as they shall deem proper, not being contrary to law or to the constitution of the bank. Or, instead of establishing such offices, it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation, from time to time, to employ any other bank or banks, at any place or places that they may deem safe and proper, to manage and transact the business proposed as aforesaid to be managed and transacted by such offices, under such agreements, and subject to such regulations, as they shall deem just and proper. But the managers and directors of every office of discount, deposit, and distribution, established as aforesaid, shall be annually appointed by the directors of the bank, to serve one year; each of them shall be a citizen of the United States, and shall hold, at the time of his appointment, not less than five shares in the said bank, bona fide in his own right; and if he shall cease to be a stockholder to that amount, he shall cease to be a manager or director of such office of discount, deposit, and distribution; and not more than three-fourths of the said managers or directors in office at the time of an annual appointment, shall be re-appointed for the next succeeding year; nor shall any person be a manager or director for more than three out of four years; but the president may be always re-appointed.

17. The said corporation, all offices of discount, deposit, and distribution, and of deposit and distribution only, which shall be established by the said directors as aforesaid, and all banks by the said directors employed in lieu of such offices as aforesaid, shall be bound to receive, upon deposit, the Treasury notes of the United States which have been or may be hereafter issued by virtue of any law or laws of the United States; but it shall be optional with the said corporation to pay and discharge the checks or drafts of the persons making such deposit, in Treasury notes, for the amount thereof, either in gold or silver coin, or in the notes of the bank, or in Treasury notes. And all banks by the said directors employed as aforesaid, in lieu of the offices aforesaid, shall be further bound to receive on deposit, and to circulate, the notes of the said corporation, on the same terms, and in the same manner, as the notes of the said banks respectively are received and circulated; and, from time to time, issue and exchange for the said notes of the said corporation, other notes of the said corporation, or the notes of the said banks respectively, or Treasury notes, at the option of the persons applying for such issue or exchange. The said corporation shall, at all times, distribute among the offices of discount, deposit, and distribution, and of deposit and distribution only, and at all the banks employed in lieu of such offices as aforesaid, a sufficient sum, in the various denominations of the notes of the said corporation, and in the Treasury notes which it may receive upon deposit from the Government, to answer the demand therefor, and to establish a sufficient circulating medium throughout the United States and the Territories thereof.

18. The officer at the head of the Treasury Department of the United States shall be furnished, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, with statements of the amount of capital stock of the said corporation, and of the debts due to the same; of the moneys deposited therein; of the notes in circulation; and of the cash in hand; and shall have a right to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the said statement: Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That if the said corporation, or any person or persons for or to the use of the same, shall deal or trade in buying or selling any goods, wares, merchandise, or commodities whatsoever, contrary to the provisions of this act, all and every person or persons by whom any order or direction for so dealing or trading shall have been given, and all and every person and persons who shall have been concerned as parties or agents therein, shall forfeit and lose treble the value of the goods, wares, merchandises, and commodities, in which such dealing and trade shall have been; one half thereof to the use of the informer, and the other half thereof to the use of the United States, to be recovered in any action at law, with costs of suit.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That if the said corporation shall advance or lend any sum of money, for the use or on account of the Government of the United States, to an amount exceeding three hundred thousand dollars; or of any particular State, to an amount exceeding fifty thousand dollars; or of any foreign Prince or State, (unless previously authorized thereto by a law of the United States,) all and every person and persons, by and with whose order, agreement, consent, approbation, and connivance, such unlawful advance or loan shall have been made, upon conviction thereof, shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, treble the value or amount of the sum or sums which shall have been so unlawfully advanced or lent; one-fifth thereof to the use of the informer, and the residue thereof to the use of the United States.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the said corporation, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, until otherwise directed by act of Congress.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the subscriptions and payments to the said bank shall not be made and completed, so as to enable the same to commence its operations, or if the said bank shall not commence its operations on or before the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, then, and in that case, this act shall be null and void.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That it shall at all times be lawful for a committee of either House of Congress, appointed for that purpose, to inspect the books, and to examine into the proceedings, of the corporation hereby created, and to report whether the provisions of this charter have been by the same violated or not; and whenever any committee, as aforesaid, shall find and report, or the President of the United States shall have reason to believe, that the charter has been violated, it may be lawful for Congress to direct, or the President to order a scire facias to be sued out of the circuit court of the district of Pennsylvania, in the name of the United States, (which shall be executed upon the president of the corporation, for the time being, at least fifteen days before the commencement of the term of said court,) calling on the said corporation to show cause wherefore the charter hereby granted shall not be declared forfeited; and it shall be lawful for the said court, upon the return of the said scire facias, to examine into the truth of the alleged violation; and if such violation be made appear, then to pronounce and adjudge that the said charter is forfeited and annulled: Provided, however, Every issue of fact which may be joined between the United States and the corporation aforesaid shall be tried by jury. And it shall be lawful for the court aforesaid to require the production of such of the books of the corporation as it may deem necessary for the ascertainment of the controverted facts; and the final judgment of the court aforesaid shall be examinable in the Supreme Court of the United States, by writ of error, and may be there reversed or affirmed, according to the usages of law.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That, during the continuance of this act, and whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the said corporation shall do and perform the several and respective duties of the Commissioners of Loans for the several States, or any one or more of them, at the times, in the manner, and upon the terms, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That no other bank shall be established by any future law of the United States, during the continuance of the corporation hereby created; for which the faith of the United States is hereby pledged: Provided, Congress may renew existing charters for banks in the District of Columbia, not increasing the capital thereof; and may grant charters, if they deem it expedient, to any banking associations now in operation in the said District, and renew the same, not increasing the capital thereof. And notwithstanding the expiration of the term for which the said corporation is created, it shall be lawful to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits, for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed, but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever: nor for a period exceeding two years, after the expiration of the said term of incorporation.

The PRESIDENT'S objections were also again read; and on motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Thursday next.

The bill to allow a drawback of duties on spirits distilled, and certain goods, wares, and merchan-

On motion, by Mr. GILES, two members were added to the Committee on Military Affairs; and Messrs. SMITH and VARNUM were appointed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Indiana Territory;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. VARNUM, from the Militia Committee, reported a bill to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States; and the bill was read.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same;' and the act, entitled 'An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches,'" reported it with amendments.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the better regulation of the Ordnance department;" together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and the amendments having been agreed to, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On motion, by Mr. GILES, the bill as amended was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, further to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings within the City of Washington.

SENATE.

Defence of the City of Baltimore.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

[There took place on the subject an interesting debate. Messrs. LACOCK, BARBOUR, DAGGETT, and KERR, were the principal advocates of the bill, and Messrs. MASON, DANA, and GERMAN, its principal opponents.]

DEFENCE OF THE CITY OF BALTIMORE.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of the Committee of Vigilance and Safety of the city and precincts of Baltimore, praying effectual protection against the enemy, as is stated in the memorial; which was read, and on motion, by Mr. SMITH, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The memorial is as follows:

To the President of the United States, and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, the memorial of the Committee of Vigilance and Safety of the city and precincts of Baltimore.

Your memorialists beg leave to draw your attention to the necessity of providing a force adequate to the defence of the city of Baltimore, during the next campaign, and, in doing so, they would take the liberty to submit the following statement and reflections for your consideration:

Nothing has so strikingly illustrated the easy accessibility of the city of Baltimore to an invading enemy, as the demonstration made upon it during the last Summer. It then appeared that large frigates, and any number of bomb vessels, could, without molestation from the shore, approach and lie within shell range of Fort McHenry, the chief strong hold of the city; and that, unless the channels should be seasonably and effectually obstructed, they might approach within reach of the city itself along a prong of the Patapsco, called Ferry Branch. It also appeared that any number of troops may with ease be landed on that long narrow slip of land, called Patapsco Neck, the most remote point of which is about twelve miles from Baltimore, and that, when landed, unless checked or repelled by an equal or superior force, they may, in a very short time, be marched to the assault of any part of the city. Thus much has been clearly evinced by the late attack of the enemy. The other directions from which assaults were seriously apprehended, it might be highly imprudent to point out and explain in a paper, with the contents of which the enemy may hereafter become acquainted; and the more especially since that enemy, everywhere barbarous and malignant, may well be supposed to cherish a peculiarly rancorous spirit of hostility against a city from which he has been driven back with disappointment and disgrace, and to be anxiously attentive to all the means by which he may best explore every avenue to assault, and be enabled to select the weakest and most vulnerable.

The people of Baltimore, apprized of the power and temper of the enemy with whom they had to contend, have, during the last Summer, exerted every means in their power to render their city as strong and as defensible as possible. They hold in readiness obstructions prepared to be thrown into the channels of the river leading to the city, at the shortest notice; have, chiefly by their own personal labor or contributions, caused forts, redoubts, or breastworks, to be thrown up, and nearly completed, under the direction of the military authority, round about the whole extent of the city; and they have aided, as far as in their power, in procuring and mounting the ordnance necessary and suitable to the works so erected. When those lines and forts shall be well and fully manned, Baltimore will feel perfectly secure; its citizens may then with confidence set the enemy at defiance; but not till then.

Your memorialists deem it unnecessary to state the strength of the regular force now stationed here, because the most correct sources of information upon this subject are at the seat of Government. It is, however, confessedly very inferior, and inadequate to the defence of the city. Your memorialists have not been able to ascertain with precision the number of men requisite for the defence of Baltimore; but from a consideration of the ease with which the city may be approached, both by land and water, as manifested in the late attack; of the various points to be defended; of the reported threats and disposable force of the enemy; and also of information obtained from some of the most experienced and intelligent military characters, they are strongly impressed with a belief that a considerable permanent force of regulars is indispensable to the safety of the city. Whether such a force can be detached from the military establishment now on foot, is more than your memorialists can undertake to say; but every expectation that it would be done, has thus far been withheld from them, and they have uniformly been given to understand that their reliance must be placed, during the next campaign, as heretofore, on the militia to be called together as occasion may require. Against such an arrangement your memorialists, on behalf of their fellow-citizens, the people of Baltimore and its precincts, must beg leave warmly to remonstrate and most decidedly to protest. The inefficiency of militia alone for any regular or important operation of war, has been so often and so fully tested that it cannot now be necessary to adduce either proofs, or arguments, to show what has been so long and universally admitted. The experience of this, as well as that of the Revolutionary war, shows that, to repel the hasty predatory incursions of an enemy, militia may often be brought to act with much effect, and that they are a useful, and often powerful auxiliary force in partisan warfare; it also shows that it would be extremely unsafe to rely upon them solely for the defence of the extensive lines of a large city against any very considerable invading regular force. An army of militia, to be equal in strength to that of a regular one, must always be vastly superior in numbers; yet, however, the history of military affairs in all times has shown, that a mere mass of armed men, or undisciplined militia, beyond a certain number, brings with it little or no additional strength. Taking this principle as correct, your memorialists do humbly conceive that scarcely any militia force that could be hastily collected about their city, could secure it against a large invading army of well disciplined regulars. Your memorialists have no reason to doubt the courage of their fellow-citizens composing the militia; far otherwise; they insist only that, without the combined movement, concert, and discipline of a regular army, courage can do nothing, and numbers produce only confusion and disorder. A militia force, hastily assembled, is not only the most unsafe, it is also the most expensive. They are not, it is true, usually retained in service during a whole campaign; but being necessarily far more numerous than regulars, and infinitely more wasteful of all the munitions of war, they are in the end much more costly and burdensome. But the exclusive use of a militia force brings with it other evils, of a nature so striking and fatal, as, even if it were not liable to the charge of prodigality and insecurity, might induce us to avoid it. It interrupts the pursuits of husbandry, and embarrasses every branch of industry, to the impoverishment of individuals and the ruin of the State. It draws into the field men who are not prepared, either in mind or body, for its hazards or fatigues; possessing little capacity to annoy the enemy, and yet less to endure the privations and hardships of a camp. It is known to destroy by disease and to break down the constitutions of more than double the numbers of those who perish or are permanently injured by sickness in a regular army; and to augment the sum of human misery, far more than enlistments could, by diffusing more widely anxiety among families in proportion to the superior numbers of the militia force, and the superior importance of the greater part of it to those who are connected with or depend upon them.

Your memorialists are aware that it may be difficult, perhaps impossible, to provide a body of regulars, enlisted upon the terms of the existing laws, in season for the defence of their city during the next campaign, but they flatter themselves that a law might be framed and passed, by virtue of which the necessary number of able-bodied men might be called into the field for local, stationary, or limited service, during one campaign, at the least, if not longer.

Your memorialists would here beg leave to observe that, as among the most important powers of the General Government is that of the right to declare war, so the providing supplies, and all the means for its active prosecution, and the superintending its faithful and vigorous management, are among its most sacred trusts and binding obligations. The rapid and decisive movements of war imperatively require, to insure even safety, much more success, a corresponding promptitude and decision of the Government by which it is waged; a war of enterprise and vigor not only drives danger from the door of every citizen, calls forth a bold, manly spirit of patriotism, and adorns the nation with rays of imperishable glory, but is also the least costly, the least wasteful of human life, the least tedious, and almost always terminates in the most sure and lasting peace. While, on the other hand, the shrinking policy of bare defence paralyzes the powers of the nation, imperceptibly wastes its resources, and invites the aggressions of an enemy. Under such impressions, it would be the earnest wish of your memorialists that the energies of their country should be so actively and forcibly exerted as to drive their present enemy, with his barbarous system of warfare, far from their homes; but, since that seems to be at present impracticable, owing to his greatly superior powers, they do, therefore, humbly beg and entreat that the means for their defence may be provided by a timely and adequate exercise of the legitimate and wholesome powers of the nation. Unless the General Government does, by a seasonable and vigorous effort, provide for the common defence along the Atlantic border, your memorialists are very seriously apprehensive that they will be amongst the first, and, perhaps, the most signal, of the victims of the ruinous policy of relying altogether upon an inefficient militia force, or of leaving every State to defend itself according to its ability; for a crisis has now arrived, when not only the city of Baltimore, but the State of Maryland itself, can only hope for protection and safety through the powers and means of the National Government. Exposed and vulnerable as Maryland is, to its centre, harassed and plundered as it has been, it feels, with the most lively sensibility, that it is now, indeed, wholly dependent upon the Union for salvation; for, alone, it is utterly unequal to the contest. The present war has, however, clearly shown that the most potent of the States is not altogether equal to its own defence, and that one of the smallest has compelled the enemy to fly from its territory, when aided by the powers of the Union. When your memorialists consider how very obvious it must be to the mind of any one, who will reflect only for a moment upon the subject, that a single campaign, undertaken by Maryland alone, in defence of its own shores, would not only prostrate its finances, but, perhaps, mortgage its resources for ages to come, without, in the end, effecting any valuable purpose; they feel inspired with the highest degree of confidence that their National Government, so eminently characterized for its impartial and liberal justice, will with alacrity and promptitude afford them the succor so necessary to their safety; nor do they feel less confident that there is not a single citizen of Maryland, so lost to a just regard for his own best interests, as to hesitate one moment in co-operating with the General Government in the lawful and vigorous exercise of those powers of conducting war, by which alone they can be protected, defended, or even saved, from absolute ruin.

Your memorialists, in speaking of the merits of Baltimore, and her pretensions to the special consideration and regard of the Government, feel very sensibly the delicacy and embarrassment of the undertaking. The relative commercial importance of this city is best known at the seat of Government; it will, therefore, be sufficient barely to refer to official documents there, by which it will appear that, in this respect, it ranks as the third city of the Union. But the commercial loss and ruin, consequent upon the fall of Baltimore, certainly is not the only, nor is it, perhaps, the greatest evil to be apprehended. It is the loss of a post, the relative position of which would be so highly advantageous to the enemy, that will produce in the mind of every impartial and thinking man the greatest alarm. The prodigious extent of country commanded by Baltimore, and the facility with which the enemy might, from thence, push his predatory incursions in every direction, are obvious, and may more properly be left to the reflections of Government, than, under existing circumstances, be strongly urged or fully explained. Let the people of Baltimore should be numbered among those who forget the duty of a citizen, when every man should struggle to be foremost in discharging it, your memorialists will take leave to say a few words of their patriotism. What they have to say shall be comprised in a small compass, and shall be no more than what they believe will be the award of an impartial world. The people of Baltimore have dearly earned the privilege of speaking in the most frank and unreserved terms to the representatives of the nation. Yet they feel too tenderly for the honor and welfare of their country, even if they could be so indulged, publicly to rebuke and reproach the rulers of their choice for any errors that are past; they had rather aid than weaken, applaud than condemn. Let the following unequivocal acts and sufferings speak their ardent love for their Government and country. The metropolis of the nation was threatened; a portion of the militia of Baltimore was called on; at a very few moments' warning, they marched, with alacrity, to the aid of their country, and, on the unfortunate 24th August, they were posted in front; the loss sustained by the enemy was produced, in a great degree, by its militia, and some amongst the best of its citizens bled or fell. The enemy next threatened Baltimore itself, upon which its people, old and young, of all classes, exerted themselves to the utmost, and with the most uncommon energy, in erecting works of defence, and making preparations to meet him, and, by the most unremitting and indefatigable labors, their city was put into a tolerable state of defence by the time he appeared before it. And the city feels great pride in the recollection that, on the day so memorable to it, the 12th of September, the constancy, fortitude, and courage of its citizen soldiers will bear a comparison with those of any other people on earth. Its citizens, some of whom had borne arms in their country's defence in the war of the Revolution, and her youth, met the enemy in advance, and were everywhere the first among the foremost in every perilous encounter. The banking institutions and the citizens of Baltimore, it is believed, have been as prompt and as liberal in their loans to the Government as those of any other portion of the Union.

Such are the people for whom your memorialists beg and entreat aid, protection, and defence. The Government may yet provide means in time, if prompt and vigorous measures are adopted; but there is no time to be lost. And your memorialists cannot, for a moment, entertain the painful thought that the constituted authorities of their country will turn with apathy from the earnest entreaties of a people so highly deserving their regard, and leave them to the mercy of a brutal enemy, whose hostility against them, in particular, has been so lately manifested, and so strongly excited.

EDWARD JOHNSON,
Chairman Committee of Vigilance and Safety.

BALTIMORE, January 26, 1815.

THURSDAY, February 2.

WILLIAM T. BARRY, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, in the place of George M. Bibb, resigned, and ISHAM TALBOT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the same State, in the place of Jesse Bledsoe, resigned, respectively, produced their credentials, were qualified, and they took their seats in the Senate.

The bill to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Indiana Territory," was read the second time, and referred to the committee appointed the 21st September, on the memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States," was read the second time.

THE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary for the Department of the Navy on the petition of William Elliot, referred to him on the 6th ultimo; and the report was read.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise," reported it without amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time of Oliver Evans's patent, for his improvement on steam engines," and concurred therein.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," which was presented to the President of the United States for approbation, on the 23d of January, and returned by him on the 30th of the same month, with objections.

Mr. KING rose and submitted the following observations:

The proposed bank would have a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, composed of five millions specie, ten millions six per cent. stock, funded since the commencement of the war, fifteen millions Treasury notes, and five millions to be held by the United States, and paid for in four per cent stock, to be created for this purpose.

The President of the United States objects to the bill—

1st. Because the amount of stock to be subscribed to the bank is insufficient to raise and sustain the public credit.

2d. Because no adequate public advantage will arise from the subscription of Treasury notes.

3d. Because the full aid and co-operation of the bank, in the furnishing of permanent and temporary loans, is not secured to Government during the war.

4th. Because the bank cannot be relied upon during the war to provide a circulating medium.

How the public credit could be revived, and sustained by the transfer of any sum of war stock from one citizen to another, or from the present holders to the proposed bank, is not obvious. If the war stock be taken at fifty millions, a demand for one-fifth, or ten millions of it, to be united to the bank capital, would have a temporary influence upon the stock market; and if any except stockholders become subscribers to the bank, this increase of price would be advantageous to the sellers. But the advantage would be a private one, no part of which would accrue to Government. As soon as the requisite sum is transferred to the bank, the stock will be precisely as valuable, and no more so, than it was before such transfer. Government will be obliged to make the same annual provision to pay the interest after the transfer as before. The public credit, which, after employing all the cabalistical words and manoeuvres of stock jobbers, always did, and always will, depend upon the ways and means, or the ability of Government, to fulfil its engagements, or to pay its debts in equivalent values, will be little, if at all affected by a transfer of stock from individuals to a corporation within the country, especially as these transfers are to be made at different times, and at periods of considerable distance from each other. The same debt would continue to exist, yielding the same dividends and representing the same sum of American capital as it now represents. No addition to domestic capital would be made by this operation. "If it releases the capital of A who sells the stock, it will employ the capital of B, who purchases it; and the only difference will be, that A becomes the owner of a disposable capital, which before belonged to B.

The raising of the price of stocks may prove beneficial to a Government in two ways, if it wants to borrow; the permanent, not the casual raising of the prices of the stock market, will enable it to sell new stock dearer. If foreigners come into the market, the raising of its price increases the money which must be brought into the country to purchase stocks. It was to meet the latter case, that an operation was undertaken by Colonel Hamilton, which proved to a limited degree advantageous. But although Government desires to obtain loans, it is not probable that any permanent application of the public credit would have been produced by the transfer of a given sum of the war stock to the bank, especially when the deep wound given to the public credit, by the extraordinary terms upon which the late loans were negotiated, is considered. More favorable times; a revival of industry and of commerce; an improved state of the finances, with a public income commensurate to the public expenditures, are necessary to the revival and re-establishment of the public credit.

The discrimination which is proposed to be carried still further than the bill carries it, in favor of the war stock, is impolitic. Were Government at liberty, for its own advantage (a case not now existing) to make such discrimination, the holders of war stock ought not now to desire it in their favor, as the example might be hereafter cited as a precedent against them, and in favor of the now postponed, though equally meritorious stock of the Revolution.

There should be no discrimination; the public faith knows no favorites; the holders of the war stock ought not to contend for preferences. They ought to be satisfied that the public faith, whether formerly or recently pledged, is equally precious to an honest Government, and will be alike redeemed.

If there still remains a doubt concerning the correctness of the first objection contained in the President's Message, can there be any respecting that of the second? Will no adequate public advantage arise from the subscription of Treasury notes?

Public credit, as has already been observed, depends upon the ability and inclination of Government to fulfil its contracts. Treasury notes are contracts, promising to their holders the sums, and at the times, mentioned in them. The bill provides that fifteen millions of dollars, in these notes, shall be receivable as a part of the bank capital, and when received shall be converted into fifteen millions of six per cent. stock. If not received by the bank and converted into six per cent. stock, this sum of fifteen millions of Treasury notes will fall due, and must be paid off, in the beginning of the next year. To this end money must be borrowed; and assuming the rate of the last loans, to borrow fifteen millions of dollars Government must give eighteen millions and three-quarters of a million of dollars of six per cent. stock. So that the difference between paying them off, or allowing them to be subscribed to the bank, and then converted into six per cent. stock, would be a clear saving to the public of three millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars six per cent. stock.

Moreover, by this conversion of Treasury notes into an equal sum of six per cent. stock, room would be made for a further issue of Treasury notes—the finances would also be relieved by releasing Government from the obligation to pay off their notes at a fixed day, and the ways and means, whether from loans or taxes, to the amount of fifteen millions, which would have been required for this purpose, would be left at the disposition of Government.

Is then the objection correct, which alleges that no adequate public advantage will arise from the subscription of Treasury notes to the bank?

The third objection alleges that the bank is under no legal compulsion to afford that full aid and co-operation to Government, which the Message declares to be both indispensable and necessary in the administration of the finances, the bank being neither obliged to make temporary nor permanent loans to Government.

Temporary loans to Government, in advance or anticipation of the taxes, are without doubt among the chief advantages that Government derives from a National Bank; as portions of the annual expenditure are required to be made before the taxes are collected, the bank, with mutual advantage to itself and the Government, is commonly able to make the advances wanted for this purpose, waiting for their repayment until the taxes come in.

In ordinary times every bank of circulation finds its interest in affording to the Government this accommodation; which is made pursuant to the correct maxims of commercial credit, being a loan made upon "good pledges" or undoubted security, which at a fixed, and no distant period, will repay it.

But it must be evident that such advances in anticipation of the taxes, and which are to be repaid by them, can be made only upon the faith that the currency in which the taxes are paid will be of equal value with that in which the bank makes its advances.

If, as in the instance of this bank, its notes are convertible into specie, and the taxes are payable either in them or a Government paper, which is at a discount, no one will suppose that the bank can, in such case, make advances to Government, and receive in payment thereof the depreciated paper in which the taxes are paid.

If the bill pass, the bank must redeem its notes with cash; the taxes will be receivable in bank notes or Treasury notes; the latter being at a discount, the taxes will be paid in them. Ought any one to expect that the bank will advance to Government a million of dollars in its notes, as an anticipation of the land tax, and receive in payment a million of dollars in Treasury notes, which may be at a discount of ten or fifteen per cent? Is it not plain that, instead of receiving a compensation for the loan, the bank would in such case suffer a positive loss, equal to the depreciation of the Treasury notes?

It results, that neither this bank, nor any other, whose notes are of greater value, as a currency, than Treasury notes, can make advances in anticipation of taxes, payable in Treasury notes.

The objection, therefore, against the bank amounts to this, that it cannot do what can only be done by a bank which is released from those indispensable restraints, without which no bank can with safety be established.

This objection goes further, and urges the rejection of the bill because the bank is not obliged to make permanent loans to Government. No bank doing business, upon securities of short dates, can make permanent loans, and all banks of circulation are obliged to require such securities. If any exception to this rule exist, it can only be for moderate sums. Banks, acting upon the principle, that cash advance must be upon a security or pledge, which, at a short date, enables the bank to recall its advance, are called commercial banks. Those which make loans of long duration, or of a permanent character, do so with a reliance solely upon the public credit; and without the specific pledges, demanded by banks of circulation, and which enable them to recover their money, in all cases of failure. These are called financial or governmental banks. So long as banks confine their business, whether with Governments or with individuals, to the maxims of commercial credit, receiving for their advances notes and bills of undoubted credit, and payable at early periods, or pledges of specific funds or effects—so long are they of advantage to Governments, as well as to individuals employed in any kind of business requiring the aid of credit.

But all experience has proved, and the examples are numerous throughout Europe, and as is believed without a single exception, that whenever banks become what is called financial banks, making permanent loans upon the mere pledge of the public faith, when they become the mints employed by Governments to fabricate paper to such amount, as often, and for such periods, as their wants frequently recurring, and always urgent, demand; they never fail to accomplish an extensive revolution in personal property, sometimes produce the abolition of debts, and after preying upon the credulous and unprotected, end in their own, and the nation's bankruptcy.

It has been supposed that the Bank of England is a financial bank, and an exception from this conclusion; it would require much time and detail to give a correct idea of the operations of this bank; all that will now be said in reply to this suggestion is, that whoever takes the requisite pains to understand the origin, progress, maxims, and manner of conducting the business of the Bank of England, whether with Government or individuals, will become satisfied that it transacts its business strictly upon the principles and rules of commercial credit; and that because it does so, and for that reason only, it has been enabled to afford the aid which it has done to the public, private, and commercial credit of the nation.

It would therefore seem that it is no sufficient objection to this bill that it does not oblige the bank to make large loans to Government; since to compel a bank to make such loans, upon the pledge of the public faith, or upon depreciated public securities, especially when the bank is released from the obligation to make specie payments, would be to require it to repeat the experiment so often made in different forms, both at home and abroad, which has everywhere and always failed, and which enlightened economists will all unite to condemn.

Lastly, it is objected, that the bank cannot be relied upon during the war, to provide a circulating medium.

No bank which is obliged to redeem its notes with specie, can in the present state of commerce, credit, and alarm, issue the same beyond a very limited sum.

If to the distrust which the war, and a real, or supposed scarcity of specie, create, be united an unusual demand for specie to be hoarded, or sent abroad for security, or to compensate unfavorable balances of trade, in lieu of the produce usually exported for this purpose; and if at the same time a considerable depreciation of the public credit takes place, a case will exist in which banks of circulation are reduced to the necessity of either a total suspension of business, or such an abridgement of it, as to render them incapable of circulating their notes in quantities commensurate to the public demands.

The objection, therefore, is not against the structure of the bank, but against the condition of the country, and the state of the public credit, which may compel the bank to curtail its circulation.

In effect, the objection amounts to the confession that no bank which confines its business to the only safe and practical test of a paper circulation will, or can afford, important aid in the furnishing of a circulating medium, in times and circumstances like the present; that no bank, except one which is released from the obligation to pay its notes in specie, can now afford a circulating medium; in a word, that none but a bank which would circulate a depreciated currency, and which it would be dangerous to create, ought now to be established.

It might suffice to have shown that the President's objections ought not to prevent this bill's becoming a law; but a few words may be added Proceedings.

SENATE.

concerning the bill. The amount of the capital of the bank has already been mentioned. Its duties and general provisions are conformable to those of the late Bank of the United States; they have had a fair trial, and have been approved; whatever that bank would have done, this would be able to do; and advantages such as it afforded to Government in the management of the finances, this bank would in due time be equally or more capable of affording.

It has not been contended, that at this time, owing to the condition of the finances and credit of the United States, as well as to the general stagnation of trade, and the distrust of every kind of credit, any safe bank that might now be established, could afford to Government or to individuals much, or important assistance by loans, even of a temporary kind.

But the agency of this bank would now be of service to Government; whatever it should be able to do would be well done. Its operations would all be solid, and of standard character; its business must be limited, but it would be safe and exemplary; and with regard to every other moneyed institution, conducting its affairs honestly, it would cherish and sustain it.

Moreover, by the establishment of this bank upon sound and approved maxims, although it may not now do what no safe bank can do—much good—it will do no injury. It will not contribute still further to depreciate public and private credit; and during the term of its charter, it will prevent, a circumstance worth much, the establishment of a bank upon false and dangerous principles. On the return of peace, the agency and influence of this bank will become invaluable in the recovery and re-establishment of the credit and finances of the nation.

For these reasons, therefore, which had their influence in the passage of the bill by the Congress, and the force of which remains not only undiminished, but the latter of them is increased by the objections made by the President, it is earnestly to be wished, although scarcely to be hoped, that the bill may become a law.

The concluding paragraph of the Message of the President is incomparably the most important. It is this which opens and interprets the object desired to be attained by the rejection of this bill. Congress are here admonished by the President to make haste "to substitute" (in lieu of the bill) "a more commensurate and certain provision for the public exigencies."

The President of the United States, after alluding to the exigent and perilous condition of the country, after insinuating to Congress in language not to be misunderstood, that the resources of the Treasury were exhausted, that extraordinary succor from loans were no longer attainable, that a bank created upon safe and approved principles could afford no public assistance, plainly intimates that paper money, and only paper money, will, or can assist the nation in the further prosecution of the war. If this be so, if by the neglect and mismanagement of the finances and profusion in the public expenditures, the country is already reduced to this situation, and the President announces the same to Congress, will they prove themselves the faithful friends of the people, unless they seasonably apprize them of the fact, however humiliating?

If paper money be necessary, avow it, prepare it, issue it; but under every caution and guard which can be devised to mitigate its evils.

All experience, public and personal, demonstrates that every object is attained with more certainty and greater advantage by a direct than by an indirect course.

Why, then, will Congress by the creation and employment of a bank attempt to conceal their actual condition and real object? Why establish a bank which, dealing only in paper, will fabricate and lend as many millions as Congress may desire to borrow? Why pay to this bank an interest of six per cent. for the loan of their notes, which in no single ingredient will, or ought to be thought, to be of greater value than Treasury notes. The people of this country have much natural sagacity, and will not long be deceived by this or any similar contrivance. Rather devise an improved scheme for the immediate issue of Treasury notes, let them be convertible at pleasure into a public stock, bearing a high interest; fund this stock by pledging specific taxes to pay the interest; the credit of this currency will be better than that of the notes of such a bank as it is desired should be created.

If a paper circulation alone will enable us to defend the country, prepare and make use of it; but spare us the expense of paying interest for it to a company, whose faculties, without our contributions, will enable them to make dividends equal to their utmost desires.

When Mr. KING had concluded, the question was taken, Shall this bill pass? and was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 19, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative, are,

Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Tait, and Thompson.

Those who voted in the negative, are,

Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Chace, Condit, Gaillard, Kerr, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Wells, and Wharton.

So it was,

Resolved, That this bill do not pass, two-thirds of the Senate not agreeing thereto.

FRIDAY, February 3.

On motion, by Mr. LACOCK, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States," was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to consider and report thereon.

tioned "An act for the better regulation of the Ordnance department," reported it with amendments; which were read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, having been agreed to, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read the third time as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Saltus, Son, and Company, merchants of the city of New York;" a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to receive into the service of the United States certain corps which may be raised and organized by any State, to serve in lieu of the militia thereof;" a bill, entitled "An act for the regulation of the courts of justice of Indiana;" a bill, entitled "An act to amend and extend the provisions of the act of the sixteenth of April, 1814, entitled 'An act confirming certain claims to land in the Illinois Territory, and providing for their location;'" also, a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Government for the year 1815," in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The five bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts for establishing a Navy Department, by adding thereto a Board of Commissioners," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and, the amendments having been agreed to with further amendment, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the purchase of a tract of land for the use of the United States," together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee; and on motion, by Mr. BROWN, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act concerning Weston Jenkins and others;" and, no other amendment having been proposed, it passed to the third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act concerning Matthew Guy, John Woodward, Samuel Tennyson, and Wilfred Drury," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and, the amendments having been agreed to, the President reported it to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same;'" and the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee. And the amendments having been agreed to, in part, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly. And Mr. KERR moved to amend the bill, by adding thereto a new section, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That, if either the States of Ohio or Louisiana shall pay its quota of the direct tax, according to the provisions of the aforesaid act, the Legislatures thereof shall be and they are hereby authorized and empowered to collect of all the purchasers of public lands, under any law of the United States, a just and equal proportion of the quota of said States, respectively, the compact between the United States, and the said States to the contrary notwithstanding."

The further consideration of the bill was postponed till to-morrow.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings within the City of Washington.

Mr. FROMENTIN had moved yesterday to recommit the bill to a select committee. On this motion Mr. F. addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I am called upon to give the reasons which prompted me to make the motion now under consideration. I will endeavor to give to the Senate such an account of my motives as will enable them to judge of the propriety of the reference.

It may, perhaps, not be useless on this occasion to take a retrospective view of the length of time which has elapsed, after the erection of those buildings was determined on, before they could be used for the purposes for which they were intended, and of the sums of money which have been spent upon their construction. We shall be the better able to anticipate the probable time when these buildings may again be occupied by Congress, and to form a correct estimate of the sums of money which we may have to appropriate for those purposes.

Sir, it is more than twenty-three years, if I am correctly informed, since the public edifices, proposed now to be rebuilt, were begun to be erected. None of them, at the time of their destruction by the enemy, were completely finished; and I believe, the south wing of the Capitol was not ready for the reception of the House of Representatives more than four or five years before it was destroyed. If it be found necessary to rebuild, instead of repairing, the other hopeless alternative offered by the bill on your table, you may reasonably expect, taking into consideration the present situation of the country, especially if the war should continue, and thereby the difficulty of procuring materials, and of getting workmen, should be increased, that the two wings of the Capitol may be finished, and ready for the reception of both Houses of Congress, in about ten or twelve years.

The public buildings, including the President's House, did not cost less than fifteen hundred thousand dollars. We are told that five hundred thousand dollars will replace those edifices in statu quo. Sir, notwithstanding my respect for the artists who have given an opinion on this subject, I have still some doubts of the practicability of making use of the walls as they are now standing. The architects themselves are not positive on that point. They gave their opinion before the very severe frost, which we had this Winter, had its effect upon those susceptible and unprotected walls. Their opinion, if a new examination was now had, might be materially different; and the committee themselves, by reporting a bill for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings, instead of confining themselves to reporting a bill for repairing, have manifested a doubt, which it cannot be improper for me to entertain. If, then, you should ultimately be compelled to rebuild (and I firmly believe you will) the expense for rebuilding cannot be much less than the original cost of construction. The materials which you may save will about pay the expense of taking down the walls before you can rebuild.

Great, indeed, I should almost say incalculable, must be the advantages presented by this favorite situation, which, under the pressure of our present emergencies, could induce this Congress to sacrifice such immense sums of money. Three principal reasons have been adduced in support of this bill by its friends. The pride of the nation has been appealed to, and pressed into the service of this bill. Sir, when gentlemen entrench themselves behind the inexpugnable bulwark of pride, it would be in vain to use any arguments directed to their sober judgment. As well might you attempt, sword in hand, to pierce the heart of your enemy, protected from your attack by a fortress, flanked with a hundred cannon. The fortress is to be taken first; and I know of no argument strong enough to batter down the fortress erected by pride. There is but one way to come at it, sir; and it is by erecting alongside of it another pride fortress, and then fairly to begin the assault on both sides.

I, too, have my pride—not a pride to be fed upon the unpaid blood of the soldier who wins our battles; not a pride to be gratified by the vain and useless display of a borrowed, ragged magnificence. No, sir; my pride is less voracious, it is less ostentatious. Provide for filling the ranks of your Army; provide for clothing, feeding, and paying, your soldiers and sailors. Instead of borrowing money for building costly edifices, borrow money for protecting against an invading foe the edifices yet standing. Drive the enemy from the country; then, indeed, my pride will be satisfied; then I will, with pleasure, vote money, as much money as you please, for rebuilding our public edifices; and then the more magnificent the plan, the more elegant its execution, the more my pride will be gratified.

It is further said, in support of this bill, that the plan recommended by the bill was the plan of Gen. Washington, and under the sanction of that imposing name an attempt is made to mislead our understanding. True, sir, this was the plan of Washington—but, under what circumstances? Washington was then President of the United States. The country then was rich; the country was prosperous. An extensive, unrestricted, and almost unlimited commerce brought then to the remotest corner of this vast continent all the treasures of a tributary world. The anxious eye of Washington measured the distances, and his capacious mind was not discouraged by them. The rapid, the almost prodigious progress of every improvement under his auspicious Administration, justified, in the opinion of that great and modest man, the anticipated expectations of corresponding improvements under the Administration of his successors. But, sir, what has been the result? Instead of realizing the high expectations of General Washington, from causes which it is foreign to my subject here to investigate, this country once rich, is now poor; this country once prosperous, is now fallen. I hope, sir, it will rise again; but till then, speak not to me of what Washington did. Speak what Washington would now advise; I say advise. The recollection of General Washington's unshakable firmness in the year 1795, forbids the idea of the possibility of his ever having had to act under such an accumulation of distressing circumstances.

When I cast my eyes on this wilderness, dignified with the name of a city; a city to be sure, very unlike the old-fashioned European city, alluded to by the Irishman, who, when placed in the middle of it, complained that he could not see the city, there were so many houses! Sir, we run no risk of hearing of any such complaints about this city. Every Irishman who arrives here may have a full view of the whole ground at once. None of those encumbrances called houses to limit the boundless prospects. Or, if there be a few, he may, among those few, open a complaisant gap through which his inquisitive eye may pierce to a distance, limited only by the foot of the surrounding hills. But, sir, the subject is too serious to admit of its being thus long treated with levity. Let me then return to it, and seriously inquire about the present state and future prospects of this city. What do we see here? Twelve or fifteen clusters of houses at a considerable distance from each other, bringing to our recollection the appearance of a camp of nomad Arabs, which, however, if connected together, would make a very respectable town, not much inferior, perhaps, to the capital of Virginia; and here and there an insulated house; the whole of it, when seen from the ruins of our public edifices, looking more like the place where proud Washington once stood, than where humble Washington now lies. If, sir, such is the situation of this city, after fifteen years since the Government removed here, during the six first years of which period there prevailed not only in this country, but all over Europe, a degree of enthusiasm bordering upon madness respecting the future destinies of this metropolis, and during which period of six years, too, this country enjoyed still the benefits of the Administration of Washington, whose good deeds for several years after his death were still in force—Washington, in his tomb, still securing the prosperity of this his beloved country—if, sir, such be now the situation of this city, what, in the present state of things, are our prospects for the future? Awful, indeed. How many ages must elapse before this chaos is likely to assume anything like a describable shape? How many, before these disjointed, distracted, warring elements may be brought together, so as to form a whole, which may entitle it to be what it now purports to be, but what it is not. Is it not time, then, that we should give up the unsuccessful experiment? Is it not time, that we should adopt less lofty ideas, that we should assume sentiments, that we should express opinions more conformable to our present situation. Troja fuit, fuit Ilium. It becomes us to be modest. Our laws to be wholesome, need not be enacted in a palace. A large, convenient, unadorned house, which will receive its lustre from Congress, instead of Congress borrowing it from the house, in the neighborhood of the public offices, in a part of the city which is best calculated by its actual improvements to afford accommodation to the members, and to facilitate their communications with each other, will answer our purpose much better than the plan recommended by the bill on your table; and if the place to erect those edifices be judiciously selected, it is to me quite immaterial in what quarter of this city. For want of the necessary information as to the quantity of ground still owned by the Government in the different parts of this city, I could not now form any opinion as to the spot where it would be proper to concentrate all our public edifices, whether temporarily or permanently. But I may be allowed to express a wish that it may be found convenient to place them as near as possible to Georgetown, not very distant from the improvements known under the appellation of the Six and Seven Buildings; and I have little doubt, but that, when in compliance with the uniform laws of nature, you shall have blown up a soul into this city by creating a heart from which the blood may uninterruptedly circulate to the remotest extremities, the improvements will, by degrees, extend in every direction, until the now most distant parts from that spot, no longer shrivelled, sickly, lingering, rootless slips, destined to vegetate a few mornings, in an uncongenial soil, being in their turn reconnected with a sturdy, robust trunk, from which they will derive an invigorating sap, will soon spread a wide hospitable foliage, and become a flourishing portion of a city, the future prosperity of which cannot now, if it come at all, be secured in any other way.

I am not unaware, sir, that such a plan will call into action against it all the private interests which will conceive themselves to be aggrieved by it. But, let private interest beware. In my opinion, unless some such plan is resorted to, without some such compromise is made, the Government will not, cannot remain here many years. The inconveniences are too serious, and they are not to be surmounted. I speak not of them with reference to the individual inconvenience of the members. I speak of them in reference to their public duties. It is unnecessary to repeat what I before stated, when I had the honor to address you on the subject of this bill. Only reflect on the only mode in which we can transact business in this place. Selected from various places of this immense empire, we meet here, not altogether free from the prejudices which prevail more or less in every part of the country we come from. This social intercourse which ought to prevail, which I am sure should prevail, did we know each other otherwise than through the incorrect medium of party representation, is entirely prohibited by the insuperable obstacles which the present situation of this city puts in our way. To these local prejudices are to be added party spirit, prejudices which pursue us unremittingly, and will not let go their hold of us in this very sanctuary. This party spirit, instead of being softened into something like conciliation, by a constant intercourse, is hardened into unutterable asperity by the mode of life, we are compelled from impetuous circumstances, to pursue in this place. The very houses where we board have become a test by which to ascertain the political opinions which we are supposed to profess. We never meet, but in battle array. Is it wonderful, that under these discouraging circumstances, so many months should be wasted in transacting business which, under less unfavorable auspices, might have been gone through in as many weeks. Sir, it is my firm conviction, that if we proceed on to passing this bill in its present shape, the question of removal of the seat of the Government from this place, which was advocated at the beginning of this session in the other branch of the Legislature, will soon want no advocate at all; it will soon become a matter of necessity, of sheer necessity. There may be still many unsuccessful attempts, but, sir, the best interests of the nation cannot forever be sacrificed. After some struggling, an attempt will succeed at last; and it will then be too late for the opposers of the plan which I have suggested to give themselves up to unavailing repentance.

Mr. President, I want to prevent such a state of things. I am unwilling to bring forward again, at any time, the question of a permanent seat of Government. I want this sacred spot—sacred still in my eyes, although temporarily polluted by the foot of the enemy, as long as it bears the name of Washington; I want this spot to remain forever the permanent seat of the Government of the United States. But, sir, I know of but two ways to accomplish that object; either by a temporary removal by the very act providing for which we should provide likewise for our return; not provide simply; I do not mean by a clause in the bill to that effect, but by previous appropriations, by contracts, which it should not be in the power of any succeeding Congress to repeal, or by an immediate concentration of the public buildings on a modest, economical and commodious plan. Of these two modes, I prefer the last, as likely to meet with fewer obstacles, as being much less expensive, but principally as being much more consonant to the principles of the justice which we owe to the people of this District. Sir, when this bill was reported, I inquired from the honorable chairman of the committee who reported it, for the papers relating to the original fixation of the several places for the building of the public edifices. I inquired for the contracts with the original proprietors of the soil, or with the purchasers. I was answered, that there was no such instrument. I shall take no advantage from this concession; in my view of the subject, there was a contract—a solemn contract; and if by any possible way it could be avoided, I would not now agree to altering, in its most inconsiderable dispositions, any part of the original plan. I am sensible, that by so doing, we seem to punish the people of this District for having placed too much confidence in our words. In our words, did I say? In our acts, sir! Look at the new ruins of the monuments on yonder hill. Were these massy walls, which have set at defiance the whole power of an enemy bent on destruction, intended to last only the short space of a dozen years? In these surviving walls I read, in characters not to be effaced, the contract of the nation with the people of the District. I find in these walls an agreement signed, sealed, and delivered. Certainly, sir, you must be convinced, from what I have just now said, that I do not dissemble to myself, and that I am not willing to conceal from others, the equity of the claims of the people of this District. But what is to be done? Imperious necessity commands a sacrifice of some sort. A compromise must take place. You have but a choice of evils. The very bill on your table promises a tardy relief to the people on Capitol Hill, at the end of ten or twelve years. Under these impressions, and under the belief too, that the people of the District at large are ultimately to be benefited by a concentration, for the reasons previously advanced, however a few may appear likely to be sufferers by any ultimate determination as to the spot where the concentration is to take place; and under an unshakeable persuasion, that by a strict adherence to the old plan, in our present circumstances, as recommended by the bill on your table, the people of this District, by grasping at too much, will ultimately lose all—from motives of economy; from motives of duty to the people of the United States; from motives of indispensable convenience to ourselves to enable us faithfully to discharge our public duties; from motives of justice to the people of this District—I have been induced to make the motion to refer that bill to a committee, for the purpose of reporting another bill to concentrate the public buildings. Sir, I am disposed to sacrifice everything, but my duty to the people of the United States at large, to keep the seat of Government here; and if you agree to concentrate the public buildings, in the hope of speedy improvements, by which many of the inconveniences which now affect the public interest will be removed, I am perfectly reconciled to remaining in this city. But, sir, if we are to remain here as we now are, with no other cheering prospects than those presented in the bill on your table, I do not hesitate to declare, that any place in the United States appears to me preferable to Washington, and the sooner we go, no matter where, no matter how heavy the amount of compensation justly due to the inhabitants of this District, the better.

Bank of the United States (introduced by Mr. BARBOUR) was read a second time.

A motion was made by Mr. GILES to refer the bill to a select committee.

On this motion a wide debate took place. The argument for reference was, the usage in such cases, where a bill was introduced by an individual member; the argument against it was, that though the bill was recently introduced by an individual member, the subject was one which had been widely discussed and was well understood by every member.

The motion to commit the bill was negatived, 18 to 16.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GILES moved an amendment, the object of which was to confine the stock (payable on account of subscriptions to the capital of the bank) to such stock as should be hereafter created.

After an animated and interesting debate, this motion was negatived—for the motion 15, against it 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Kerr, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, and Wells.

their valor, skill, and good conduct, on the 8th of January last, in repulsing, with great slaughter, a numerous British army of chosen veteran troops, when attempting, by a bold and daring attack, to storm and carry the works hastily thrown up for the defence of New Orleans, and thereby obtaining a most signal and complete victory over the enemy, with a disparity of loss, on his part, unexampled in military annals.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be struck a gold medal, with devices emblematical of this splendid achievement, and presented to Major General Jackson, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress, of his judicious and distinguished conduct on that memorable occasion.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolutions to be communicated to Major General Jackson, in such terms as he may deem best calculated to give effect to the objects thereof.

When the above resolutions were under consideration, Mr. BROWN, of Louisiana, addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. President: Having the honor to represent the State which has been the theatre of the events which it is the object of these resolutions to commemorate, it might be considered an evidence of great insensibility on my part, did I not rise for the purpose of expressing my most hearty approbation of them.

The reflecting mind, in reviewing the eventful measures by which the people of Louisiana have been conducted from a position of extreme peril to a state of perfect security, is irresistibly led to acknowledge the protecting hand of an all-wise and beneficent Providence, whose dispensations it is our duty, in grateful humility, to revere.

The richest reward which a nation can bestow on its distinguished benefactors, is to be found in the unanimous expression of a nation's gratitude. On no occasion has the united voice of national feeling been more distinctly heard, than on that which is the subject of our present deliberations. The measures adopted by General Jackson for the protection of Louisiana, and their happy results, have been succinctly detailed in his own simple, perspicuous, and modest narrative. It is not now necessary to recapitulate the facts. It is enough that we fix our admiring eyes on their fortunate results. If to disconcert the gigantic plans of the enemy—to disappoint his extravagant expectations—to humble his pride—to destroy a great part of his hitherto invincible army—to expel them from our soil, and save a State to the Union, and to accomplish all with a comparative loss unexampled in military annals, can entitle a brave general and a gallant army to the thanks of a generous people, then are General Jackson and his followers entitled to the wreath prepared for them by these resolutions. I shall not follow the deliverer of Louisiana through the blaze of battle and the shouts of victory; I am not so weak as to believe that my feeble voice can add lustre to deeds like his—"to deeds without a name." The tears of admiration and gratitude which moisten every eye whilst surveying scenes like these, admonish me, that it is best to indulge in the silent sentiment of unutterable joy.

The army of General Jackson was principally composed of militia corps, a species of force hitherto not considered as the most efficient, which had been hastily collected from the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and the Mississippi Territory. It is equally honorable to these soldiers, and to their commander, that no jealousies or dissensions disturbed the harmony of their camp, and that all united in facing the foe with a courage, an energy, and enthusiasm, rarely witnessed in an army of veteran troops. All were animated by the same soul, and the only contest which existed among them was, who should be foremost in the hour of danger.

The citizens of Kentucky, since the commencement of our present struggle, have obtained a character so elevated for patriotism and devotion to the best interests of their country, that it can receive no additional lustre from any expressions I can employ. The State of Tennessee has exalted claims to the approbation of the nation. To that State we are indebted for the safety of our country when threatened by our savage neighbors, and the part which her citizens have acted on the late ever memorable occasion, will afford to their latest posterity a rich repast in the page of impartial history. One-third of the militia of this State, having no exposed frontier to protect, and threatened by no immediate danger, cheerfully left their friends and their families and flew to the assistance of Louisiana. Generous people! on behalf of those you have succored in the hour of peril, I thank you—from my heart I thank you!

Reflect, Mr. President, on the rapid march of General Coffee and his volunteers to Mobile, to Pensacola, to New Orleans, a distance of more than one thousand miles. Consider the difficulties of the route, and you will admire the perseverance of the commander, and the patience and discipline of his troops, as much as you will applaud the undaunted bravery they displayed on the memorable eighth of January. See the brave and indefatigable Carroll descending the Mississippi with an army of three thousand men, and accomplishing his voyage in a space of time considered too short to enable the greedy speculator, in search of a market, to conduct a single ark to the same point of destination. It is to such men, and to such exertions as these, that Louisiana is indebted for her safety, and so long as gratitude shall be considered a virtue, shall these brave men be held in grateful remembrance.

On so much of these resolutions, and other resolutions now under consideration, as relate to the militia and people of Louisiana, it would not, perhaps, become me to enlarge. Attached, as I feel myself, to the generous people of that State, by the recollection of a thousand proofs they have given me of their kindness and confidence, I could not profess to be their impartial eulogist. That their conduct on the late trying emergency has been such, as not only to fulfil the predictions of their friends, and efface the unfavorable prejudices of those who until now were strangers to their true character, but also to receive the approbation of the nation, is to me a source of inexpressible pleasure.

Mr. President, I fondly hope that the dawn of peace is about to break upon our beloved country. Cheered by its benignant rays we look into futurity, and calculate the influence which the recent events at New Orleans may have upon the destinies of this nation. To foreign Powers, the lesson taught by them will be full of instruction. From the fate of a powerful army invading a portion of our country, hitherto considered the most assailable, they will learn that freemen, impressed with a sense of the value of their rights, and armed in defence of their own soil, are invincible. At home, the effects of these brilliant achievements will be salutary and beneficent. Should the inhabitants of any portion of this Union, from incorrect sources of information, have received impressions unfriendly to the character of the people of Louisiana, let them reflect on the events of the 8th of January, and those impressions will be completely obliterated. The ties of interest and of affection, which have long attached the Western States to Louisiana, have now become indissoluble. The purple stream of their best blood has united and mingled in the same channel, and has at once cemented their union and that of their country.

Mr. FROMENTIN, of Louisiana, addressed the Chair, as follows—

Mr. President: The resolutions now under consideration seem to call for a few remarks from those who have the honor to represent on this floor the country upon whose inhabitants the mark of signal favor contemplated by the resolutions is now proposed to be conferred. It would ill become me on this occasion to affect a vain modesty, equally injurious to the virtues which have deserved, and to the generous discernment which is going to bestow approbation.

Mr. President, we have often been called upon, since the beginning of this war, to give thanks to the intrepidity of our military leaders, and the undaunted bravery of their troops. We have just now, by a unanimous vote, awarded the same tribute to Jackson and to his followers. To Jackson—this name henceforth wants none of the meretricious epithets of courtesy—to Jackson, whose laurels on the ever memorable 8th of January will adorn the fairest page of American military history;—to Jackson, whose unheard of achievements, having no precedents in the past, seem to bid defiance to the future. Through this beloved General we gave the same unanimous thanks to his followers. I will not, sir, give them the surname of invincibles; be it enough for their glory, that they have proved to the world that if, until they landed in Louisiana, the soldiers of Lord Wellington had been unconquered, they were not unconquerable.

Sir, with heartfelt gratitude I joined in the vote just given in honor of those valiant men. Let us now pass from the review of the brilliant and exterminating virtues exhibited on the field of battle, to the contemplation of the modest and saving virtues exhibited in the city of New Orleans.

So far had the campaign in Florida been prolonged beyond the time contemplated at its beginning, that Winter was threatening, before the Tennessee militia, under General Coffee, hastily collected for a Summer expedition, were disbanded, to be recalled again under the banners of their country before they had reached their homes, in order to defend a distant State against the invasion of an enemy more numerous and more formidable than the enemy they had subdued. So ardent and so anxious was the zeal of our Tennessee and Kentucky brethren, headed by Carroll, Thomas, and Adair, that, regardless of the inclemencies of the approaching season, they listened to no voice but the voice of their invaded country; they were sensible of no want, but the want of meeting the enemy.

Already had the Mississippi received the brave, who were destined to add such a celebrity to its fame; already had its rapid current brought them within a short distance of the spot polluted with the foot of an invading foe; a more terrible enemy than the one they were ready to encounter had nearly overcome them.

Frost, threatened in his long enjoyed empire over the Northern Lakes of America, made an effort in December last to establish his empire over the mouth as it has usurped it over the head of the Mississippi.* Not far from the tropics the ruthless invader shook his icy bristles; for a few days the mouths of our creeks were sealed up by the tyrant; but assistance was at hand from above. This Winter, Mr. President, was fertile with prodigies. A genial sun had arisen in the West, whose powerful and revivifying rays soon expelled the monster, and compelled him to fly back to his uncontrolled patrimonial haunts in the caverns of the Lakes, and in the recesses of the wildernesses of Canada—a forerunner, Mr. President, of the fate which in a few days was to befall his co-invader and British ally. Have I, Mr. President, in attempting to give you an idea of a natural phenomenon in Louisiana, given you a true picture of the real scenes which, in the meantime, were acting on that interesting theatre?

Yet, during the temporary reign of the tyrant, our soldiers, for the reasons above stated, unprepared to withstand his attacks, were suffering severely. Are those brave men who have sacrificed everything to run to the relief of their distant friends, to be doomed to fall a victim to their own generosity? Forbid it humanity, forbid it patriotism, forbid it gratitude!

I wish, Mr. President, I had it in my power to delineate with proper colors the interesting spectacle which New Orleans exhibited in those distressing days. Not a man unengaged in repelling the enemy, not a woman not affording the most zealous assistance and co-operation in preparing clothing and every other necessary comfort for their protectors! Accompany me, Mr. President, within those walls, a few days ago the asylum of hundreds of young females, taught by the precepts and by the examples of their pious and respectable mistresses all the virtues and all the accomplishments, which are soon to be the ornaments of society. How changed is the scene! Those grates, never before opened but to Religion, are now thrown open for the reception of suffering, of bleeding humanity! Under the pious direction of their respectable religious chief, the nunnery of New Orleans is converted into an hospital for our sick and wounded! The holy flame spreads with rapidity! Every soldier in a distant land has found a brother! Every sick individual has found a family!

*It is a fact, not less true than extraordinary, that, on the 23d December last, when the St. Lawrence and the Northern Lakes were quite free from ice, the Bayou St. John, behind the city of New Orleans, was frozen over.

Mr. President, I rejoice, that the resolution reported by the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee embraces the cases I have briefly alluded to. Sir: Valor is the natural growth of every clime of this extensive empire. Even in the very few actions during this war in which victory did not perch on our banners, as evinced by a late celebrated case connected with the capture of this city, scrutinizing justice has pronounced that examples of conspicuous individual bravery have not been wanting. I shall always be proud of the opportunity afforded to pay to courage the just tribute due to it by a grateful people. But, when it is right thus to encourage valor, can it be wrong to encourage humanity? Valor, Humanity—Inseparable sisters! The first has delivered our country from an invading foe—the second has healed the wounds of a bleeding friend, and of a bleeding enemy—since no longer with arms in their hands, to be treated as a friend. Both united will continue to secure to our arms the favor of an avenging and merciful God, and will wrest from a vanquished enemy, and obtain from an admiring world, the applause due to a conqueror terrible in battle—in victory merciful.

ILLEGAL SEIZURE OF A VESSEL.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, on the petition of Gould Hoyt, referred to him by resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant; and the report was read. It is as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury, to whom the petition of Gould Hoyt was referred by a resolution of the Senate, passed the 9th of February, 1815, having considered the same, in obedience to that resolution, has the honor to report:

That the petition contains various allegations which are not supported by any evidence that is either produced by the petitioner, or possessed by the Treasury Department: and that it contains various complaints, which are either founded upon such imperfections of the judicial institutions of the United States as cannot constitute the peculiar grievance of the petitioner, or upon such conduct in the public officers of the district of New York as would, it is believed, receive from them a satisfactory explanation, were an opportunity afforded for that purpose.

That, under these circumstances, the Secretary of the Treasury presumes that he shall best discharge his duty to the Senate by stating the facts of the case referred to him, according to the evidence which is in his own possession, without dwelling upon the allegations of the petition.

That, in the year 1809, the United States and France were at peace. The island of St. Domingo, a colony of France, had declared itself independent; and, after successive changes in its form of Government, two rival chiefs, Christophe and Petion, claimed the sovereignty. But France, in constant and decisive terms, asserted her parent right to the colony; and the American Government, so far from recognising the independence of St. Domingo, had passed two laws prohibiting all intercourse with such parts of the island as were in possession of the revolted subjects of France. The violation of those laws, on several occasions, had been the cause of great inconvenience to the United States.

That it was the policy of the American Government to avoid all participation in the conflict between France and her colony, as well as in the conflict between the native competitors for the sovereignty of St. Domingo; and, therefore, whatever might be the indulgence shown to a mere commercial intercourse with that island, after the expiration of the acts of Congress, which expressly prohibited it, the Government never ceased to watch with particular attention any equipments in the ports of the United States, which were apparently destined to increase the military means of either of the parties to the insular war, or which might be directed by the Government of the island against the Government of France. The United States being at peace with all the world in the year 1809, there could hardly be a pretext for such equipments, with a view to the protection of American commerce; and the armament of the American merchant vessels had not been authorized by law.

That the ship American Eagle, which furnishes the subject of the petition under consideration, appears to have been a large frigate-built ship, formerly called the Marquis of Lansdowne, captured by the French from the British, and sold by the captors to American citizens. On the 18th of November, 1809, information was officially given to the Treasury Department, that "this ship had been for some time repairing at New York, and was then nearly completed in the very best manner, and pierced for thirty-six guns; that conjectures were various; that the object in view could not be discovered; but that some illicit, some forced trade was no doubt in view." On the — day of December, 1809, further information was officially given to the Treasury Department, that "a vessel had lately arrived at Norfolk with a cargo of coffee, under Swedish colors, which was said to belong to —, of New York; that the vessel was the schooner Gustavus, Captain —, or —, master, (for there were said to be two captains on board;) that she went in under a plea of distress, but was supposed to have only sought an opportunity of waiting for orders from the owners or consignees; that the cargo was said to be the property of the Government of Port-au-Prince, and designed to form the funds, in part, for the payment of the American Eagle, a large ship understood to be fitting out at New York for that Government, and nearly ready for sea."

That, on receiving these communications, (which were corroborated by publications in the newspapers,) a letter was addressed from this Department to the collector of New York, dated the 12th of December, 1809, stating the information "that the ship American Eagle was fitting out for Petion, who had purchased her," and observing "that if that be the fact, the President directed her departure to be stopped, as embraced by the act of the 5th of June, 1794," prohibiting armaments within the United States, in violation of their neutrality. But it does not appear that any act was done, in pursuance of this authority, conditionally given to the collector of New York.

That, on the 11th of April, 1810, further information was officially given to the Treasury Department, that "since the letter of the 12th of December, 1809, the ship American Eagle had very little done until then, when twenty or thirty men were employed, and there was every appearance of soon getting the ship ready for sea." And the answer to this information was given on the 27th of April, 1810, "that if any satisfactory evidence could be obtained of the ship's being intended to commit hostilities against a friendly Power, or for any other illegal purpose, she ought to be detained; but, if no such proof can be had, the vessel must then be watched, and not suffered to arm, or carry any military stores in her hold."

That to these official communications, and the public notices of the gazettes, it appears the Minister of France, in June, 1810, added "his remonstrances respecting the armament of the American Eagle, which he stated to be destined for one of the black chiefs of St. Domingo; and that the agent who superintended the armament was an ancient secretary of a General of Brigade, named La Plume, formerly commanding officer at Aux Cayes." On the 26th of June, this information was communicated to the collector of New York; and that officer replied, that "he would omit no legal step, in conformity to the instructions of the Treasury Department." But, in a letter from this Department, dated the 29th of June, 1810, a more particular direction was given, and the collector was required critically to investigate every circumstance relative to the ship, to consult with the district attorney, and, if it could be legally done, to prevent her departure; for her equipment, and the information given by both the collector of Baltimore and the French Minister, created a strong presumption that she was intended for one of the St. Domingo black chiefs; a destination not only contrary to the interests of the United States, but directly contravening the laws of nations, and forbidden by the third and fifth sections of the act of the 5th of June, 1794." It was added, that "the safest way, if the district attorney concurred, would be to libel the ship under the third section of the act; and that the President of the United States expressly recommended that every exertion be used to detect and prevent such gross violation of their laws and neutrality."

That, on the 30th of June, 1810, the surveyor of the port of New York, having, with the inspectors of the customs, examined the ship American Eagle, in pursuance of orders from the collector, reported, "that there was on board a person who said his name was John Howard, at present master of the vessel, and had been in that capacity at least six months last past; that, upon interrogating Captain Howard, he stated that the ship was owned by James Gillespie, merchant of New York, by whom he was employed as master, to superintend repairing the ship, which he had done till January last, at which time she was nearly finished, when Gillespie sold her to Hoyt & Tom, under whose orders he now acted, and has acted since they became owners. He did not know how or where the ship was to be employed; the only persons belonging to the ship were himself, Mr. Mooney, mate, and two or three seamen; that the surveyor proceeded to search the ship throughout, when (as near as could be ascertained) she had on board about one hundred and thirty barrels of salted provisions, twenty hogsheads of shipbread, and one hundred hogsheads of water, with a complete set of stone ballast; neither guns, small arms, ammunition, nor other implements of war, were found on board; she had a thorough repair from her keel up, with new copper, new masts, rigging, and sails; the latter all upon the yards; that the ship was calculated to carry twenty-four guns on her main deck, and fourteen on her upper deck; that her repairs and outfits, all together, were in a man-of-war style; and that nothing was wanting to send the ship to sea (if she went without guns) but a complement of seamen."

That, under all these circumstances, the collector of New York was informed, by a letter from this Department, dated the 6th of July, 1810, that "in the opinion of the President, the ship American Eagle ought to be immediately seized and libelled, as being fitted out for illegal purposes, unless the owner should give satisfactory proof of the contrary." But neither at the time of the survey, nor at any antecedent or subsequent time, nor in the petition under immediate consideration, has it appeared (so far as the evidence is possessed by this Department) for what voyage the ship American Eagle was actually equipped and provided in the manner which the survey describes, if the intention were not to prosecute the voyage to St. Domingo, for the purpose of delivering her to Petion, the asserted owner.

That, in pursuance of the instructions which have been stated, the ship American Eagle was seized on the 10th day of July, 1810, and was libelled in the district court. The indisposition of the district judge appears to have suspended all the business of that court for a considerable period; and owing entirely, it is believed, to that cause, the case of the American Eagle was not tried and decided until the 24th of August, 1812. The court acquitted the vessel, ordered her to be restored to Gould Hoyt, the claimant, and also refused to certify that there was reasonable cause for the seizure. The vessel remained in the custody of the marshal from the time of the seizure until the decision. Mr. Hoyt has since brought an action against the seizing officers, in the supreme court of the State of New York, for the damages sustained by the seizure and detention, which action is still depending. It is thought to be irregular and improper, under these circumstances, to state the opinion of the district attorney as to the probable issue of the action.

That repeated overtures have been made to this Department by Mr. Hoyt for a settlement or compromise of his claim for damages against the officers who seized the ship American Eagle, upon the presumption that they are eventually to be indemnified by the Government. But there was no power in the Department to adopt either the mode proposed for ascertaining the amount of the damages, or the mode proposed for liquidating that amount when ascertained.

That, upon the same presumption of an eventual responsibility on the part of the Government, Mr. Hoyt has presented the petition under consideration to Congress; in which he states, that "he would be well satisfied to obtain for the vessel the money that she has actually cost him, (computed at one hundred thousand dollars,) with charges and interest, in full satisfaction for any claims he may have on account of the seizure." He concludes, however, with praying "that the proper officers of the Government may be authorized to purchase the said ship upon such terms as to Congress may seem proper; or that he may have such relief in the premises as in the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet."

Upon this general view of the case, the following considerations arise:

1. Whether any, and what, damages will probably be recovered in the suit against the seizing officers?
2. Whether the seizing officers are to be eventually indemnified by the Government?
3. Whether the damages, if the payment shall be now assumed by Congress, ought to be assessed by a jury, by arbitrators, or by the accounting officers of the Treasury?

All which is respectfully submitted.

A. J. DALLAS.

TREATY OF PEACE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress copies of the Treaty of Peace and Amity between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, which was signed by the Commissioners of both parties at Ghent, on the 24th of December, 1814, and the ratifications of which have been duly exchanged.

While performing this act, I congratulate you, and our constituents, upon an event which is highly honorable to the nation, and terminates, with peculiar felicity, a campaign signalized by the most brilliant successes.

The late war, although reluctantly declared by Congress, had become a necessary resort to assert the rights and independence of the nation. It has been waged with a success which is the natural result of the wisdom of the Legislative councils, of the patriotism of the people, of the public spirit of the militia, and of the valor of the military and naval forces of the country. Peace, at all times a blessing, is peculiarly welcome, therefore, at a period when the causes for the war have ceased to operate; when the Government has demonstrated the efficiency of its powers of defence; and when the nation can review its conduct without regret and without reproach.

I recommend to your care and beneficence the gallant men whose achievements, in every department of the military service, on the land and on the water, have so essentially contributed to the honor of the American name, and to the restoration of peace. The feelings of conscious patriotism and worth will animate such men under every change of fortune and pursuit; but their country performs a duty to itself, when it bestows those testimonials of approbation and applause which are at once the reward and the incentive to great actions.

The reduction of the public expenditures to the demands of a peace establishment will doubtless engage the immediate attention of Congress. There are, however, important considerations which forbid a sudden and general revocation of the measures that have been produced by the war. Experience has taught us that neither the pacific dispositions of the American people, nor the pacific character of their political institutions, can altogether exempt them from that strife which appears, beyond the ordinary lot of nations, to be incident to the actual period of the world; and the same faithful monitor demonstrates that a certain degree of preparation for war is not only indispensable to avert disasters in the onset, but affords also the best security for the continuance of peace. The wisdom of Congress will, therefore, I am confident, provide for the maintenance of an adequate regular force; for the gradual advancement of the Naval Establishment; for improving all the means of harbor defence; for adding discipline to the distinguished bravery of the militia; and for cultivating the military art, in its essential branches, under the liberal patronage of Government.

The resources of our country were, at all times, competent to the attainment of every national object; but they will now be enriched and invigorated by the activity which peace will introduce into all the scenes of domestic enterprise and labor. The provision that has been made for the public creditors, during the present session of Congress, must have a decisive effect in the establishment of the public credit, both at home and abroad. The reviving interests of commerce will claim the legislative attention at the earliest opportunity; and such regulations will, I trust, be seasonably devised as shall secure to the United States their just proportion of the navigation of the world. The most liberal policy towards other nations, if met by corresponding dispositions, will, in this respect, be found the most beneficial policy towards ourselves. But there is no subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberations of Congress, than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence, and attained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States during the period of the European wars. This source of national independence and wealth, I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress.

The termination of the legislative sessions will soon separate you fellow-citizens, from each other, and restore you to your constituents. I pray you to bear with you the expressions of my sanguine hope, that the peace which has been just declared will not only be the foundation of the most friendly intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, but that it will also be productive of happiness and harmony in every section of our beloved country. The influence of your precepts and example must be everywhere powerful: and while we accord in grateful acknowledgments for the protection which Providence has bestowed upon us, let us never cease to inculcate obedience to the laws, and fidelity to the Union, as constituting the palladium of the national independence and prosperity.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States.

Mr. S. SMITH.—Mr. President: It may not be improper for me, as chairman of the committee who presented the bill now under consideration, to give a short history of the subject, and to present a few details taken from official authority. Soon after the adoption of the present Constitution, Congress passed acts laying duties on tonnage and on goods imported into the United States. The law provided that six cents per ton should be paid on ships or vessels of the United States entering any of the ports of the United States, and fifty cents per ton on all foreign ships, and that an additional duty of ten per cent. on the duties payable on all goods imported in vessels of the United States, should be paid on such goods when imported into foreign vessels. These, Mr. President, are what are called "the discriminating duties."

The advantage derived therefrom to the navigation of the United States was such, that in a very few years there was American tonnage sufficient for the carrying of all the productions of our own country, and of other nations to a great extent—in fact, our navigation was second to none but Great Britain, when the late war was commenced.

The effect of those discriminating duties was felt by those foreign nations with whom we had the greatest intercourse. Great Britain, in the Treaty of 1794, reserved the right of countervailing those duties, and the United States bound themselves not to impose any new discriminating duties if Great Britain did countervail—but the wars in which she has constantly been engaged since has prevented its effects from being felt to any considerable extent. The short peace she had after the Treaty of Amiens taught the merchants of South Carolina, however, to know, that the extra duty on cotton imported in an American vessel into Great Britain was so high that it was much better to employ British vessels than to have their cotton carried in their own. In the year 1802, a letter was received from Mr. King, then Minister of the United States at London, in which he advises the repeal of the discriminating duties. The President's Message (I believe at the opening of the next session) called the attention of Congress to the subject; and so much of the Message as related to the discriminating duties was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who made an ample report thereon, which report, I pray may be read—[Here the Secretary read the report, dated January 10, 1803.]

Mr. President, the resolution which accompanies and which is similar to the bill before you, was taken up and would perhaps have passed, but for the memorials which came from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other trading cities and towns. I now find that gentlemen, who then opposed and petitioned, have changed their opinions. I remark, with pleasure, the change in an honorable gentleman, formerly a member of the Senate, in a published letter to Mr. Randolph. He, as well as many others, who at that time opposed by memorial the repeal of our discriminating duties, are convinced that their conditional repeal will tend to the security of our navigation.

Mr. President, the report just read shows, that the British had, by their countervailing duties, secured for their ships the carrying of many of our most important objects of exportation, to wit: of fish-oil, tobacco, cotton, rice, pot and pearl ashes; and having secured the carriage of those articles, the minor articles not being (except flour and naval stores) sufficient to form entire cargoes, would also be carried by British ships. But, Mr. President, the British Parliament have since increased the old and laid new duties, which include other articles of our produce and effectually secure to her ships the carriage of all our bulky articles, to wit: on flour, 6s. 9d. sterling per cwt., or 12s. per barrel, by which the American vessel will pay 1s. 2½d. on each barrel more than if imported in a British ship. The whole freight of a barrel of flour in time of peace is 5s. sterling. No person will agree to pay 6s. 2½d. to an American for the freight and extra duty on a barrel of flour, when he can procure British ships who will carry for five shillings.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Hemp now pays three pounds sterling per ton more if imported into Great Britain in American, than if it be imported in a British ship; which I believe is equal to the whole freight. And hemp will soon become an object of export from New Orleans.

Cotton—the duty thereon has been increased in England. It now pays 8s. and 7d. sterling per cwt., if imported into Great Britain in British ships, and 17s. and 2d. in American; that is, cotton in an American will pay 8s. 7d. per cwt. more duty than when imported in a British ship; being more than the whole freight; so that it is better to pay freight to a British ship, than to have cotton carried free of freight in an American.

Rice pays 3s. 9d. sterling per tierce more duty in an American ship than in a British. The whole freight of a tierce of rice is 12s. sterling.

Pot and pearl ashes now pay 6d. sterling per cwt. more duty in an American, than in a British ship. A cask of ashes of three hundred weight will pay an extra duty of 1s. 6d. sterling; the freight of such a cask is presumed to be 5s. 6d. sterling; thus a cask of ashes will pay for freight and extra duty, 7s. in an American, when it will only pay 5s. 6d. in a British ship.

Tobacco pays 1s. 6d. per 100 lbs., or 18s. sterling per hhd. of 1200 net wt. more when imported into Great Britain in an American than in a British ship. The freight of a hhd. of tobacco in time of peace is 35s.

The statements I have given of the countervailing duties of Great Britain, are derived from a digest of the duties and customs brought up to the 5th August, 1811; they will show to every mind, however, prejudiced, that Great Britain has effectually secured by her system the carrying (for her own wants and her foreign commerce) of our fish-oil, tobacco, flour, cotton, pot and pearl ashes, rice, hemp, &c. I have only presented for consideration the important articles; the minor articles bear also their discriminating duties, to the disadvantage of our navigation.

Mr. President, it will be seen by the report just read, that France did, in the third year of the French Republic, lay an extra duty of near twenty-three dollars per hhd. of 1200 wt. on tobacco imported in American bottoms. It is also shown that Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Spain have their discriminating duties.

We are now at peace with the European nations. It is our interest that there should be no cause of future misunderstanding with them. If we continue our discriminating duties, and they continue their countervailing duties, the result must be, that our ships will be rendered useless. We cannot carry on equal terms, and of course will not be employed. To prevent the destruction of our navigation, Congress would be compelled to add to the discriminating duties, which would be met by foreign nations with new countervailing duties, and thus a commercial warfare would commence. Is it not, therefore, better, Mr. President, for us to agree to meet the nations of Europe on equal terms—the ships of each to be admitted into the ports of the other on the same terms with their own ships? Are we afraid of our want of enterprise, industry, or capital? I hope not. For one, I am ready to agree to the bill on the table, and feel confident that the American merchant is equal in a fair competition to the merchant of any other nation.

In Executive session—

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

Congress will have seen by the communication from the Consul General of the United States, at Algiers, laid before them on the 7th November, 1812, the hostile proceedings of the Dey against that functionary. These have been followed by acts of more overt and direct warfare against the citizens of the United States trading in the Mediterranean, some of whom are still detained in captivity, notwithstanding the attempts which have been made to ransom them, and are treated with the rigor usual on the coast of Barbary.

The considerations which rendered it unnecessary and unimportant to commence hostile operations on the part of the United States, being now terminated by the peace with Great Britain, which opens the prospect of an active and valuable trade of their citizens within the range of the Algerine cruisers, I recommend to Congress the expediency of an act declaring the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Dey and Regency of Algiers; and of such provisions as may be requisite for a vigorous prosecution of it to a successful issue.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

SENATE.

Proceedings.

FEBRUARY, 1815.

To the Senate and House ofRepresentatives of the United States:

Peace having happily taken place between the United States and Great Britain, it is desirable to guard against incidents, which, during periods of war in Europe, might tend to interrupt it; and, it is believed, in particular, that the navigation of American vessels exclusively by American seamen, either natives or such as are already naturalized, would not only conduce to the attainment of that object, but also to increase the number of our seamen, and, consequently, to render our commerce and navigation independent of the service of foreigners, who might be recalled by their Governments, under circumstances the most inconvenient to the United States. I recommend the subject, therefore, to the consideration of Congress, and, in deciding upon it, I am persuaded that they will sufficiently estimate the policy of manifesting to the world a desire, on all occasions, to cultivate harmony with other nations, by any reasonable accommodations which do not impair the enjoyment of any essential rights of a free and independent people. The example on the part of the American Government will merit, and may be expected to receive, a reciprocal attention from all the friendly Powers of Europe.

"That they fully accord in the policy recommended, of avoiding, by prudent regulations, the occurrence of circumstances which may disturb a liberal intercourse with foreign nations. They are, moreover, persuaded that the navigation of American vessels, exclusively by American seamen, either natives, or such as are already naturalized, would not only have the tendency to render our commerce and navigation independent of the service of foreigners, but that it would be calculated to remove the pretext under which the American navigation has heretofore been interrupted.

"But, while the committee consider the subject of the President's Message highly important, they regret that the session of Congress is so near its close, that questions affecting the foreign as well as the domestic policy of the nation cannot now receive the deliberate and full examination to which they are entitled.

SALE OF CAPTURED NEGROES.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report from the acting Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 24th of October last.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1815.

The Message and report therein referred to were read, and ordered to be printed.

The report is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 28, 1815.

The undersigned, acting as Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 24th of October last, requesting the President of the United States to lay before the Senate, (provided he shall not consider the same improper to be communicated,) the proof of any traffic carried on in the West Indies, by the sale of negroes taken from the United States, by the British forces since the present war, has the honor to state, that such proof was transmitted to the Executive by the Hon. St. George Tucker, in the form of an affidavit of Captain Williams, from which it appeared that he had been a prisoner in the Bahama islands, and that, while there, he had been present at the sale of negroes taken from the vicinity of Norfolk and Hampton. This affidavit, voluntarily given, and strengthened and corroborated by a variety of circumstances, was considered at the time as full proof of the fact, and was transmitted to our Ministers at Ghent. When the resolution of the Senate was transmitted to this Department, application was made to Judge Tucker, and subsequently to Major Griffin, for the original affidavit, or for an authenticated copy; as neither have yet been received, and as it is deemed improper longer to delay this report, the undersigned begs leave to refer to the accompanying papers, marked 1, 2, 3, and 4, from which the material facts stated in the affidavit may be collected, and the circumstances which have prevented its transmission to this Department explained. This subject will be further investigated with a view to place it, in all its circumstances, in the most satisfactory light.

All which is respectfully submitted,

JAS. MONROE.

No. 1.

RICHMOND, November 24, 1814.

SIR: I do myself the honor to enclose you a letter from my friend, Mr. Cabell, and one from Mr. John Tabb Smith, the magistrate before whom the affidavit was made, a copy of which I transmitted to the President. Mr. Campbell has written to Major Griffin to endeavor to procure the original, and if he should fortunately obtain it, I will lose no time in forwarding it to you.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ST. G. TUCKER.

JOHN GRAHAM, Esq.,

Department of State, Washington.

No. 2.

Copy of a letter from Joseph C. Cabell, Esq., to the Hon. St. George Tucker, dated

RICHMOND, November 22, 1814.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your favor of the 14th instant, embracing an extract from the letter recently written to you by Mr. Graham, of the Department of State, on the subject of the resolution of the Senate of the United States, of the 24th ultimo.

I distinctly recollect all the material circumstances in regard to the copy of the affidavit, which you forwarded to the President. About the period that Major Thomas Griffin, of York, went on board the British squadron in Lynnhaven bay, for the purpose of endeavoring to recover his negroes, who had gone off to the enemy, I happened to be in Williamsburg. The destination of the slaves that had been taken or received by the British, was then a subject of curiosity and concern throughout the lower country. I understood that a seafaring man, of the name of Williams, who had been a prisoner with the enemy, and had recently arrived at Hampton, had gone in company with Major Thomas Griffin, of York, before John Tabb Smith, a respectable magistrate of the county of Elizabeth City, and had made oath that, while a prisoner in one of the Bahama islands, he had been present at the sale of the negroes that had been carried off from the vicinity of Hampton and Norfolk; that the negroes were sold at a high price, and that a negro carpenter from Norfolk was purchased for a thousand dollars. Several gentlemen of the first respectability, who had conversed with Major Griffin, informed me that he spoke of Williams as a man whose appearance entitled him to credit, and that he had, accordingly, published the affidavit in the town of York. Through the medium of Mr. Coke, of Williamsburg, I procured a copy of this paper, which I handed to you, and was forwarded by you to the President. This affidavit was a subject of general conversation about that time. The circumstances under which Williams arrived at Hampton; the manner in which he described the negroes sold in the Bahamas, and particularly the carpenter from Norfolk, and the appearance of entire sincerity in his narrative, left no doubt, I was assured, on the mind of either Mr. Smith or Major Griffin, that the alleged sale had actually taken place. I did not see Major Griffin, nor did I inquire what he intended to do with the original affidavit of Williams; my conjecture was, that he would send it on to the committee of Congress, charged with the business of collecting proofs of the barbarous conduct of the war by the enemy. As it seems he has not done so, I presume it remains in his possession. I will write immediately to him, with the view of ascertaining whether this be the fact; and, if it be, to request the favor of him to enclose me the affidavit. The result of my inquiries of that gentleman shall be made known to you without delay.

In the interim, I remain most respectfully and sincerely, yours, &c.

JOSEPH C. CABELL.

No. 3.

Copy of a letter from John Tabb Smith Esq., to Judge Tucker, dated HAMPTON, Nov. 21, 1814.

SIR: Your favor I have now before me. Some time in the year 1813, there came before me a Captain Williams (I think his name was) in company with Major Thomas Griffin, of York, with the affidavit you speak of in your letter, which he swore to before me, and I gave my certificate thereto; I then gave the affidavit to Major Griffin, and expected to see it published in one of the Richmond papers, but never heard of it since; but from your letter, I expect the original can be got from Major Griffin. But, if it is mislaid, I will recollect the substance of the affidavit, and will render you any service in my power.

I am, with respect,

JOHN TABB SMITH.

If it can be got from Major Griffin, it had better be in the Captain's own words, with my certificate.

YORK, (VA.) February 16, 1815.

SIR: Your favor of the 6th instant has been received. I have examined my papers and cannot find the original affidavit of Captain Williams, therein alluded to. The copy I gave Mr. Cabell was literally correct; the original has been mislaid, or I fear lost in the bustle of moving papers from hence so frequently as has been done, to place them without the reach of the enemy during the war. I will again examine and endeavor to recover the affidavit, and will forward the same to the Department of State as soon as it shall be recovered.

Very respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS GRIFFIN.

RETALIATING SYSTEM.

Mr. BIBB, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, of the 26th of September last, respecting the unauthorized mode of warfare adopted by the enemy, on the plea of retaliation, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

The report of the committee is as follows:

That, although the war has happily terminated, they deem it important to rescue the American Government from unworthy imputations, with which it has been assailed during its progress. They have, therefore, endeavored to ascertain, whether the destruction of York, in Upper Canada, and the other cases assumed by our late enemy, as authorizing a departure from the settled rules of civilized warfare, were of a character to justify or extenuate their conduct.

The result of the inquiries of the committee, manifesting to the world that the plea which has been advanced for the destruction of the American Capitol, and the plunder of private property, is without foundation, will be found in the communications of the Secretaries of the Departments of War and Navy, and of General Dearborn, commander of the American forces, in the attack on York, herewith submitted.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 28, 1815.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter, requesting, on behalf of the Committee of Foreign Relations, any information which this Department possesses, relative to the misconduct that has been imputed to the American troops in Upper Canada during the late war, and in reply, I have the honor to state, that the charges appear to be confined to three: 1st, the alleged burning of York; 2d, the burning of Newark; and 3d, the burning of the Indian villages, usually called the Moravian towns

1st. The burning of York, or of any of its public edifices, or of any its private houses, has never been presented to the view of the American Government by its own officers, as matter of information; and it never was exhibited by the British Government, or any of its officers, as matter of complaint, until it was asserted in the address of the Governor in Chief to the Provincial Parliament of Canada, on the 24th of January, 1815, "that, as a just retribution, the proud Capitol at Washington has experienced a similar fate to that inflicted by an American force on the Seat of Government in Upper Canada." This assertion having led to an inquiry, I am enabled, from official documents and general information, to state the following facts of the case, for the information of the committee.

The town of York in Upper Canada was taken by the American Army, under the command of General Dearborn, on the 27th of April 1813, and it was evacuated on the succeeding 1st of May; although it was again visited for a day, by an American squadron, under the command of Commodore Chauncey, on the 4th of August. At the time of the capture, the British troops on their retreat set fire to their magazine, and great injury was done by the explosion to property, as well as to persons, within the range of its effects. At the time of the capture, as well as at the time of Commodore Chauncey's visit, the public stores were seized, and the public storehouses were destroyed; but the destruction of public edifices for civil uses, or of private property, was not only unauthorized, but positively forbidden, by the American commanders; and it is understood that no private house was destroyed by the American troops. It has recently, however, appeared, that a public building of little value, called the Parliament House, (not the Government House), in which it is said that an American scalp was found as a part of the decoration of the Speaker's Chair, had been burnt; whether it was so, and if it was, whether it was an accidental consequence of the confusion, in which the explosion of the magazine involved the town, or the unauthorized act of some exasperated individual, has not been ascertained. The silence of the military and civil officers of the Provincial Government of Canada seems to indicate, that the transaction was not deemed, when it occurred, a cause either for retaliation or reproach.

2d. The burning of Newark, adjacent to Fort George, occurred on the 10th of December, 1813. The act was vindicated by the American General, as necessary to his military operations; but as soon as the American Government heard of it, instructions, dated the 6th of January, 1814, were given by the Department of War, to Major General Wilkinson, "to disavow the conduct of the officer who committed it, and to transmit to Governor Prevost a copy of the order under color of which that officer had acted." This disavowal was accordingly communicated, and on the 10th of February, 1814, Governor Prevost answered, "that it had been with great satisfaction he had received the assurance, that the perpetration of the burning of the town of Newark was both unauthorized by the American Government and abhorrent to every American feeling; that if any outrages had ensued the wanton and unjustifiable destruction of Newark, passing the bounds of just retaliation, they were to be attributed to the influence of irritated passions, on the part of the unfortunate sufferers by that event, which, in a state of active warfare, it had not been possible altogether to restrain, and that it was as little congenial to the disposition of His Majesty's Government, as it was to that of the Government of the United States, deliberately to adopt any plan of policy which had for its object the devastation of private property."

But the disavowal of the American Government was not the only expiation of the unauthorized offence committed by its officer; for, the British Government undertook itself to redress the wrong. A few days after the burning of Newark, the British and Indian troops crossed the Niagara for this purpose; they surprised and seized Fort Niagara; they burnt the villages of Lewistown, Manchester, Tuscarora, Buffalo, and Black Rock, desolating the whole of the Niagara frontier, and dispersing the inhabitants, in the extremity of the Winter. Sir George Prevost himself appears to have been satisfied with the vengeance that had been inflicted; and, in his proclamation of the 12th of January, 1814, he expressly declared, that for the burning of Newark, "the opportunity of punishment had occurred; that a full measure of retaliation had taken place, and that it was not his intention to pursue further a system of warfare so revolting to his own feelings, and so little congenial to the British character, unless the future measures of the enemy should compel him again to resort to it." With his answer to Major General Wilkinson, which has been already noticed, he transmitted a copy of the proclamation, "as expressive of the determination as to his future line of conduct," and added, "that he was happy to learn that there was no probability that any measures, on the part of the American Government, would oblige him to depart from it."

3d. The places usually called the Moravian towns, were more collections of Indian huts and cabins, on the river Retrench or Thames, not probably worth, in the whole, one thousand dollars. The Indians who inhabited them, among whom were some notoriously hostile to the United States, had made incursions the most cruel into their territory. When, therefore, the American Army under General Harrison invaded Canada on the — of — 1813, the huts and cabins of the hostile Indians were destroyed. But this species of warfare has been invariably pursued, by every nation engaged in war with the Indians of the American continent. However it may be regretted on the score of humanity, it appears to be the necessary means of averting the still greater calamities of savage hostilities; and it is believed that the occurrence would never have been made the subject of a charge against the American troops, if the fact had not been misrepresented or misunderstood. Many people at home, and most people abroad, have been led to suppose that the Moravian towns were the peaceable settlements of a religious sect of Christians, and not the abode of a hostile tribe of savages. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Hon. WILLIAM W. BIBB,
Chairman Com. of Foreign Relations.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 18, 1815.

SIR: In compliance with the request of the committee of the Senate, communicated to me by your note of the 14th current, I have the honor to transmit to you, herewith, extracts from the letters of Commodore Chauncey to the Secretary of the Navy, on the subject of destroying the public store-houses and stores at York, in Upper Canada, and which is all the information in this Department on that subject.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

Hon. WM. W. BIBB,
Chairman Committee, &c.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Isaac Chauncey to the Secretary of the Navy, dated off York, U. C., April 20, 1813.

"The enemy set fire to some of his principal stores, containing large quantities of naval and military stores, as well as a large ship upon the stocks, nearly finished."

From the same to the same, dated off Niagara, August 4, 1813.

"In the evening of the 30th ultimo, we weighed and stood for York, arrived and anchored in that harbor, at about 3 P. M.; on the 31st ran the schooners into the upper harbor, landed the marines and soldiers under the command of Colonel Scott, without opposition; found several hundred barrels of flour and provisions in the public store-houses, five pieces of cannon, eleven boats, and a quantity of shot, shells, and other stores; all which was either destroyed or brought away. On the first instant, after having received on board all that the vessels could take, I directed the barracks and the public store-houses to be burned. We then re-embarked the men, and proceeded to this place, where I arrived yesterday."

Letter from Gen. Henry Dearborn to the Honorable Joseph B. Varnum, a member of the Senate.

Boston, October 17, 1814.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 11th instant, I assure you, in the most explicit manner, that no public or private buildings were burned or destroyed by the troops under my command, at York, in Upper Canada, excepting two block-houses, and one or two sheds belonging to the Navy Yard. I placed a strong guard in the town, with positive orders to prevent any plunder or depredation on the inhabitants; and, when leaving the place, a letter was received from Judge Scott, chief justice of the superior court, in which he expressed his thanks for the humane treatment the inhabitants had experienced from our troops, and for my particular attention to the safety of their persons and property. A frigate on the stocks, and a large store-house containing their naval stores, were set on fire by the enemy subsequent to their offer of surrendering the troops and public property. Several of the most valuable public buildings, connected with their principal military positions, were destroyed by the explosion of their magazine, which proved so fatal to our troops; and although there were strong provocations for burning or destroying the town, nothing of the kind took place more than I have already mentioned, either by the army or navy.

Yours, with respectful esteem,

H. DEARBORN.

Hon. JOSEPH B. VARNUM.

The Senate adjourned to six o'clock in the evening.

Resolved, That, instead of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, there shall be appointed two standing committees, the one to be styled "a Committee of Commerce," and the other "a Committee of Manufactures," to consist of seven members each.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

sey, RICHARD STOCKTON; from South Carolina, ELIAS EARLE; and from Kentucky, WILLIAM P. DUVAL, appeared and took their seats.

A new member, to wit: SAMUEL DANA, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned in the representation of the State of Massachusetts, by the resignation of William M. Richardson, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, praying that further time may be given to purchasers of public lands in said Territory, to complete their payments; that the price of the public lands may be reduced, and that the quarter sections may be subdivided.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of the said Legislature, to the same effect with the memorial last stated.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of Vermont,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provisions, by law, for aiding and protecting the officers of the customs in the execution of their official duties, and for preventing intercourse with the enemy.

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, to amend the standing rules and orders, and the same being read, was again ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. DAVENPORT,

Resolved, That this House will, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, proceed to the election of a Chaplain on their part.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the capture of this city by the enemy; also, into the manner in which the public buildings and property were destroyed, and the amount in value of the property, public and private, so destroyed; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, recommended that the resolution might be laid on the table. It appeared to him that the blowing up of Fort Warburton, and the occupation of Alexandria by the enemy, should be included in the inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON assenting to the proposition, the resolution was laid on the table.

BURNING OF THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Patrick Magruder, Clerk to this House, detailing the circumstances attending the destruction of his office by the enemy; which was read, and referred to Messrs. PEARSON, TELFAIR, DUVAL, WINTER, WARD of New Jersey, KERSHAW, and KERR.

The letter is as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
September 20, 1814.

SIR: Being compelled to leave home the latter part of July, for the Springs, on account of indisposition; after leaving the clerks in charge of the office, with instructions as to their official duties, and a person in charge of the library of Congress, for the purpose of opening and airing the books, pursuant to the regulations thereof; during my absence, the invasion of this city was effected by the enemy, and the destruction of public property by them, in those departments immediately under my superintendence, ensued; and, for a more particular detail of the circumstances attending that disastrous event, I must, through you, refer to a statement of facts (submitted in a letter to me from the clerks, who were left in the office after the militia marched from the District) to the House, with a request that a committee may be raised for the purpose of investigating the subject-matter thereof, and report to the House accordingly; and, also, that the Committee of Accounts may be instructed to ascertain, as near as can be, the amount of money paid on account of the contingent expenses of the House, since the first day of January last, by the Clerk, that he may have credit for the same at the Treasury, as the public vouchers for the expenditure of the public money since that period have all been destroyed in the conflagration of the Capitol. Without the aid of such an ascertainment, by a committee of the House, justice cannot be done to the undersigned or the public.

I am, sir, with respect, yours, &c.

PATRICK MAGRUDER.

The SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, Sept. 15, 1814.

SIR: In order to correct any erroneous statements or representations which may go, or have gone, out to the public, in relation to the destruction of your office, we deem it our duty to make the following statement of facts:

At the time you left the city, (which was in the latter part of the month of July,) for the Springs in Virginia and Pennsylvania, for the recovery of your health, all was quiet, and we believe no fears were entertained for the safety of the seat of Government. Indeed, nothing was heard of the enemy, except his marauding parties in the Chesapeake, and what was seen in the newspapers, of troops being ordered from Europe to America.

About the middle of August it was stated that the enemy was in the bay, in great force, and, on the 19th of that month, the whole body of the militia of the District of Columbia was called out, under which call every clerk of the office was taken into the field, except Mr. Frost, and marched to meet the enemy.

On the 21st, the first of the undersigned clerks was furloughed, by Brigadier General Smith, at the request of Colonel George Magruder, for the purpose of returning to the city, to take care of, and save such part of the books and papers of the Clerk's office, as he might be able to effect, in case the enemy should get possession of the place; he arrived here in the night of that day.

His orders from Colonel George Magruder were, not to begin packing up until it was ascertained that the clerks at the War Office were engaged in that business; and it was not until 12 o'clock, on Monday, the 22d, that we were informed that they had begun to move the effects of that office, although we were subsequently told that it had commenced the day before.

We immediately went to packing up, and Mr. Burch went out in search of wagons or other carriages, for the transportation of the books and papers; every wagon, and almost every cart, belonging to the city, had been previously impressed into the service of the United States, for the transportation of the baggage of the army; the few he was able to find were loaded with the private effects of individuals, who were moving without the city; those he attempted to hire, but, not succeeding, he claimed a right to impress them; but, having no legal authority, or military force to aid him, he, of course, did not succeed. He then sent off three messengers into the country, one of whom obtained from Mr. John Wilson, whose residence is six miles from the city, the use of a cart and four oxen; it did not arrive at the office, until after dark on Monday night, when it was immediately laden with the most valuable records and papers, which were taken, on the same night, nine miles, to a safe and secret place in the country. We continued to remove as many of the most valuable books and papers, having removed the manuscript records, as we were able to do with our one cart, until the morning of the day of the battle of Bladensburg, after which we were unable to take away anything further.

Everything belonging to the office, together with the library of Congress, we venture to say, might have been removed in time, if carriages could have been procured; but it was altogether impossible to procure them, either for hire, or by force.

The most material papers which have been lost are, the last volumes of the manuscript records of the Committees of Ways and Means, Claims and Pensions, and Revolutionary Claims; the clerks were engaged in bringing up these records previous to the alarm, and as it was not certain that the enemy would get to the city, and being desirous to have them completed, they were not packed away with the rest, but were kept out, that they might be finished by the meeting of Congress; but with the intention of taking them to a private residence, if such removal should be found necessary. After the defeat of our troops at Bladensburg, Mr. Frost removed them to the house commonly called General Washington's, which house being unexpectedly consumed by fire, these records were thus unfortunately lost.

The secret journal of Congress was also consumed; it was kept in a private drawer in the office, and in the hurry of removal was forgotten. Its contents, however, have been, in most cases, published by order of the House.

The manuscript papers, which have not been saved, were mostly of a private nature, consisting chiefly of petitions, and unimportant papers, presented previous to the year 1799.

We regret very much the loss of your private accounts and vouchers, among which, we are sorry to add, were the receipts and accounts of the expenditure of the contingent moneys of the House of Representatives; they were in the private drawer of Mr. George Magruder, which being locked, and the key not in our possession, we delayed to break it open until the last extremity, after which it escaped our recollection.

It is well known to one of us, (Mr. Burch,) that the receipts were from the first of January last, and embraced nearly the whole amount of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House.

A number of the printed books were also consumed, but they were all duplicates of those which have been preserved.

We have thus given you a full account of our proceedings during the troublesome scene, and we flatter ourselves you will not see in them anything to disapprove, as we were guided solely by a zealous endeavor to discharge our duty to you, and to the public.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, MORRIS S. MILLER and ELISHA J. WINTER; from New Jersey, LEWIS CONDUCT, THOMAS WARD, and WILLIAM COX; from Maryland, ALEXANDER MCKIM and ROBERT WRIGHT; from North Carolina, ISRAEL PICKENS; and from South Carolina, WILLIAM LOWNDES; appeared and took their seats.

Mr. FISK, of New York, presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the city of New York, praying that an act may be passed to incorporate a National Bank.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. LATTIMORE, the petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, relative to the right of suffrage, presented on the 12th of February, 1814, was referred to Messrs. LATTIMORE, DANA, and VOSE.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of two Chaplains, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly, in which resolution they ask the concurrence of this House.

The resolution was read, and concurred in by the House.

The House then proceeded by ballot to the election of a Chaplain to Congress on their part; and upon an examination of the ballots it appeared that the Reverend OBADIAH B. BROWN was duly elected.

CAPTURE OF THE CITY.

The House, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by him on yesterday, which was again read as follows:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the capture of this city by the enemy, the manner in which the public buildings and property was destroyed, and also into the amount in value of the property, public and private, so destroyed; and that they have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, expressed his regret at the absence from the House of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH) at whose suggestion this resolution had yesterday been laid on the table. Mr. L. said it was his wish that the House should also inquire into the manner and reasons of the capitulation of Alexandria, and of the destruction of Fort Warburton. As respected the town of Alexandria, he knew that its conduct had been much misunderstood, and by some, misrepresented. He desired to know the facts on this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON made a few general observations on the nature of this inquiry. His object he declared to be, an inquiry into the preparations made, and the measures authorized and adopted by the Administration for the defence of the District previous to its invasion, and into the collection and disposition of this force by the commanding officers of the various descriptions of it. He adverted to the various opinions entertained not only at a distance but even in this District, in respect to the merits of all to whom might attach praise or censure in regard to the recent transactions. If there was blame, as even those who defended all parties appeared to admit, he wished to know with whom it rested. He had no inclination, having this single object in view, to encumber the inquiry with matters unconnected with his object, and was therefore averse to retaining the clause proposing an inquiry into the amount of private property destroyed.

Mr. LEWIS said he was as desirous as the gentleman from Kentucky could possibly be for a full and early inquiry, but he did think that everything relating to the occurrence within the District would come fairly within the inquiry. The town of Alexandria was an important part of the District. The whole District is equally under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, and Mr. L. said it was due to all that the inquiry should be general. But, as the gentleman was unwilling to accede to such an amendment as he wished to propose, he would waive it for the present, and offer it in the shape of a distinct resolution.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he was sorry he could not accord in the propriety of withdrawing the proposed amendment. The subject of the capitulation of Alexandria, and the previous destruction of Fort Warburton, was closely connected with that of the capture of the city. This District, under the exclusive control of Congress, had been approached by the enemy in different directions, up the Patuxent and the Potomac, by two divisions of the same force. It was premature now to give any opinion where the blame, if any, of what had happened should rest. He hoped it would rest nowhere; that the recent disaster would be found to be the result of the particular situation of the country, which precluded any adequate defence. But, if there was an inquiry, he hoped it would be a thorough one; one which would satisfy the nation where the blame ought to rest. In this view, he thought it would be idle to inquire why the Capitol fell, distinguishing it from any other part of the District. Fort Warburton was one of its defences; the destruction of it carries on its face great cause of suspicion—and ought therefore to be a particular subject of inquiry; and, certainly, if any part of the subject was worthy of inquiry, this was. The gentleman from Maryland being absent, he would therefore propose an amendment in the following words: "and into the causes which induced the destruction of Fort Warburton and capitulation of Alexandria."

Mr. JOHNSON had no objection to including Fort Warburton in the inquiry, but objected to also including Alexandria.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, said he did not doubt that the object of all those who interested themselves in this matter, was to have a full investigation of the subject in a national view. Instead, then, of inquiring into the particular details, he would wish to have the inquiry general, and couched in the very terms in which the President had brought it before Congress, in his Message, and he should move to amend this motion accordingly. Mr. G. then stated his proposed amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR withdrawing his proposed amendment, Mr. JOHNSON accepted Mr. GASTON's amendment to his motion; making it, with a further modification suggested by Mr. GROSVENOR, read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the success of the enemy in his late enterprises against the Metropolis, and the neighboring town of Alexandria, and into the manner in which the public buildings and property were destroyed, and the amount thereof; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, took occasion to state his opinion that it would have been more Parliamentary to have inquired into the causes of the failure of the United States to defend the District, than of the enemy's success in his enterprise against it. But Mr. W. did not move any amendment.

The motion as it now stands was agreed to, without a dissenting voice; and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. STOCKTON, Mr. MILLER, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. BARBOUR, and Mr. PICKENS, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

MONDAY, September 26.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, SAMUEL SHERWOOD, WILLIAM IRVING, and JOHN LEFFERTS, appeared and took their seats.

A new member, to wit: from Massachusetts, JOHN W. HULBERT, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Daniel Dewey, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, presented a petition from the President and Directors of the Washington Bridge Company; also, a petition from the President Directors of the Eastern Branch Bridge Company; respectively praying compensation for said bridges, they having been destroyed by the armed forces of the United States.—Referred to the Secretary of War.

On motion of Mr. LATTIMORE, the committee to whom was referred the petition of the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, praying an extension of the right of suffrage, were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the number of the members of the Legislative Council of said Territory; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to have the application of the money appropriated for the use of the Library, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

SEPTEMBER, 1814.

The resolution was read, and concurred in by the House; and Mr. SEYBERT, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. GASTON, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report on the state of the finances of the United States; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting copies of a letter from Admiral Cochrane, commanding His Britannic Majesty's naval forces on the American station, to the Secretary of State, with his answer, and of a reply from Admiral Cochrane.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. FISK, of New York, rose and addressed the House, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Upon a subject which has for several weeks past attracted the attention of this body, and indeed of every person in this nation, I feel it my duty to submit a resolution to bring the question promptly and fully before this House for examination and discussion. After the people of this country had recovered from the surprise and astonishment they felt at hearing of the capture of this city, and the destruction of the public buildings, their first inquiry was, where shall Congress sit with safety and convenience? Some designated one place, some another; but few, if any, imagined that the Councils of the nation would continue here. It is not merely necessary that the members of the General Government should be secure in their own opinion, they must be so in the opinion of the nation. The confidence and credit of the nation is identified with the security of the public Councils, and the safety of the public records. Menace this safety, and public confidence is impaired, public credit is shaken.

It was supposed, as well in as out of this House, that Congress would at an early day take this subject into consideration.

There are, I am well aware, upon this measure, a variety of opinions. The question is one of some delicacy, much interest and importance, worthy of attentive examination and deliberate decision. If it should be agitated, as I apprehend it is, in some degree to excite inquiry, to raise expectations, or create an interest by informal discussion, it is best to bring it directly and formally before this House, that it may be here examined, decided, and put at rest. With this view, and under these impressions, I have risen to ask the attention of the House to the resolution I am about to offer. If we are to have a temporary removal of the Seat of Government until the public edifices can be rebuilt, our public library and documents replaced, the sooner this shall be decided the better; and if we are to remain here, it is, under existing circumstances, desirable that this should be determined by a vote of Congress, and preparations made accordingly. I therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of removing the Seat of Government, during the present session of Congress, to a place of greater security and less inconvenience than the City of Washington; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The question on taking this resolution into consideration was decided as follows, by yeas and nays: For consideration 79, against it 37, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Caldwell, Champion, Chappell, Clark, Comstock, Conduct, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Gaston, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Harris, Humphreys, Hulbert, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lovett, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, Markell, McLean, Moffit, Moseley, Murfrey, Oakley, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Sage, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Skinner, Stanford, Sturges, Tannehill, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Cuthbert, Eppes, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Hall, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lewis, McCoy, McKee, McKim, Montgomery, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, Wright, and Yancey.

So the House agreed to consider the resolution.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, was opposed to the removal of the Seat of Government under any circumstances whatever. He was particularly opposed to it for the reasons stated in the resolution—he did not believe the City of Washington more vulnerable than any other situation east of the Alleghany Mountain, nor as much so as Baltimore, Philadelphia, or even Lancaster; to one of which, he understood, it was the wish of gentlemen to carry it. Mr. L. said, the natural situation of Washington was as well calculated to resist an enemy as any to which gentlemen could desire to remove; and the circumstance of its having been invaded, was no reason why it should be abandoned.

If proper preparations for resistance had been made by those whose duty it was to have made them, Washington had been safe against double the number of its invaders. Instead, then, of removing the Seat of Government, let us do our duty by compelling others to do theirs. Let fortifications be immediately constructed and defended by a sufficient number of men inured to the duties of the camp, and we have nothing to fear hereafter. It would, in his opinion, be degrading, under present circumstances, to remove from this place. Our enemies had exultingly declared that Congress had been driven from their seat, and should no longer continue there. Let us not, then, fulfil their predictions and gratify their wishes. On the score of accommodations, Mr.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

H. OF R.

L. observed, that although the present Hall was not as spacious and magnificent as the one we had been accustomed to occupy, yet it was as convenient as any we might calculate on getting elsewhere; at all events, it would do very well until another could be built in the City of Washington. He stated, that although from the words of the resolution a temporary removal was only contemplated, yet he verily believed that, when once started, it would never again return, and he feared the consequences that would follow. The States of Virginia and Maryland had made large donations in money to aid in the improvement of the City of Washington as the permanent Seat of the General Government, and they would not willingly submit to the sacrifice. Hundreds and thousands of individuals had been induced, from a perfect confidence in the permanency of the Seat of the National Government, to expend their all in its improvement, who will be reduced to beggary and want if this resolution is adopted. The original proprietors of the ground upon which the city stands, had given to the Government two-thirds of their property for public uses; the greater part of which had been sold by the Government, and the proceeds appropriated to public purposes. Would it be just to sacrifice these people? Mr. L. exhorted the House to reflect on the consequences of adopting the resolution. He hoped, by rejecting it, that an end would be put to similar attempts hereafter, and that the good people of the District would be permitted to repose in safety upon the faith of the Constitution and the law, and would be suffered to continue their improvements here without the dread of being sacrificed. For the last ten or twelve years, Mr. L. observed, similar attempts had been made, the effect of which was to create alarm and paralyze exertion and improvement, to the great injury of the public. He hoped the vote which would now be given would silence forever attempts which could do no good, but much harm.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, also opposed the resolution, in an energetic manner, on the grounds of expediency and Constitutionality. He also alluded to the danger of intrigue, in the operations of the Government; which, he said, was the species of friction most dangerous to the regularity and stability of Republican Government.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, in an impressive manner warned the House against listening to this proposition; and, among other observations, in his usual forcible manner, said, that if the Seat of Government was once set on wheels, there was no saying where it would stop.

Mr. FISK, of New York, expatiated on the inconveniences under which Congress legislated in this place. Their documents, he said, were stricken from their hands. This was a time, he said, requiring the united endeavors and the most intelligent exertion of the Public Councils, to save the nation. The people would not be disappointed, he said, to find Congress, with the view of promoting this paramount object, removing to a place of safety, where the means of information were more at hand than here; to a place more connected with the moneyed interest of the nation; where they could have a better opportunity to call into action the resources of the nation. As to violation of the public faith, as to any act which would have the effect to injure individuals, or to affect injuriously the States of Maryland or Virginia, he would be among the last to propose either. He did not view a temporary removal of the Seat of Government to a place of greater safety in that light. Gentlemen would admit there might be cases in which removal might be necessary, as in case of sickness, famine, threatened or actual invasion. The argument against the motion appeared to rest on this basis—that if the Government were temporarily removed, it would never return to this place. Were gentlemen aware of the bearing of this argument? It was nothing more than saying, that on a removal to any other place, the inconveniences of this would appear by contrast so strongly, that the Government could never be induced to return. He hoped arguments of this character would not induce the House to refuse an inquiry into this subject.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said he would vote against the resolution, and observed, that the reasons offered for it appear to be derived from inconvenience to Congress. That inconvenience is said to arise from loss of public documents, and inconvenience of living. In respect to living, he would make no observations. In respect to public documents, he observed, the loss thereof was great; but the probability is, that that loss can be met as well in this city as elsewhere. Congress, at the commencement of this Government, had no precedents to direct them, except what the proceedings of the Old Congress afforded. That several copies of the journals of the Old Congress, and also some copies of the journals of Congress under the present Government, may be had in this city is presumed.

He said he would pass over the Constitutional objection to a removal, and observe, that for Congress to remove from the District of Columbia because the public buildings were destroyed, may be assimilated to the removal of a man from his farm because a banditti had burned his house. For a man so to remove would be deemed an act of puerility, and display absence of wisdom and fortitude.

The eyes of Europe will be drawn to the result of the proposed resolution. A removal by them will be ascribed to a want of firmness; and at this particular time that Congress do manifest firmness and determination is safe and honorable; and so it will appear to all, on the present question. This House has an opportunity to manifest that firmness to the nation and to the world.

Mr. PEARSON, of North Carolina, said he had supposed that a gentleman who could have summoned up so much fortitude as to introduce the resolution now under consideration, would have given to the subject that reflection which would have enabled him to offer some better ground for it, some plausible reason why this most extraordinary and unheard of proposition should be adopted. If there was a man in this House, or in the nation, who could vote for the motion from motives of mere personal convenience, that man in his judgment deserved the execration of his country. If there were any great national object which required that this motion should be adopted; that the public faith should be violated; that the persons who compose the population of this city should be stripped of their property, acquired under the faith of the Government, should be turned out beggars on the community, the House would very properly enter into a consideration of such a motion. But what reasons are now offered for it? The gentleman who introduced does not say that he himself is afraid to remain here. But the gentleman says the people are agitated and uneasy, and desire the Government to remove to a place of safety. Were the people to think for the gentleman on matters coming before him here, or was he to think for himself? Were the members to consult their distant constituents whether they were safe in remaining, or was this House to determine for itself? The gentleman had said the proposed removal is only temporary; but his arguments look to a permanent removal. Where, if not here, is the gentleman to get those records, those steering oars to guide him in this difficult road? The public library is destroyed, but there are as good in this District as in any place to which it is now proposed to remove. The gentleman may, if he thinks proper, within the compass of ten miles, obtain all the books he ever read. The gentleman had intimated that Congress might, in a commercial city, obtain facilities in our financial transactions, and with more readiness procure money to carry on this war. All these arguments go to favor a permanent removal. If he was certain of any one thing, Mr. P. said, it was, that the Constitution precluded Congress from such removal. The law establishing a permanent seat of Government was bottomed on the Constitution; and, in consequence of its passage, the whole soil of the District had been transferred in fee simple to the President of the United States, upon the express condition that that act of Congress was carrying the Constitution into effect. What would gentlemen do with those thousands of people who had expended their substance in building and improving the place, and, relying on the public faith pledged by solemn acts, had given their property into the hands of the Government? The man who, in cold blood, could place the citizens of this place in the condition in which they would be in the event of removal, for considerations of a private nature, deserved eternal punishment. In another point of view, Mr. P. said, it seemed to him that gentlemen who were regardless of the honor of the country, would not be ready to heap disgrace upon disgrace, and add to the disaster of the enemy's success against this place; that they would be prevented by their national, or even party pride, from permitting the enemy to obtain a greater triumph than they have already obtained. The President had informed Congress, in his Message, that the public buildings had been destroyed, but that only a momentary inconvenience had thereby resulted to the Government. If, after this, Congress should, under the impulse of terror, or any other motive, remove from here, they will only give cause of triumph to the enemy. So far from entering into the feelings of the nation, for such conduct the people would scout us from our seats. What, sir! Shall the Representatives of a country like this, with thousands and tens of thousands of citizens ready to offer up their blood in its defence—shall we go off in a panic from a place not even menaced by the enemy? To do so would be ten times more degrading than the result of the late incursion of the enemy. Mr. P. made a number of other pertinent remarks, and concluded by saying, that, in the language of his colleague, to set the Government on wheels, would give play to the worst passions of the worst men, and everything would become fair game for ambition and intrigue.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, said he had voted to consider this motion, because he was desirous to treat with due respect every proposition made by a member of this House. But he asked, now, what great advantage would be derived from committing this subject, respecting which there could be no hesitation in deciding. The subject doubtless had been well considered before it was introduced into the House. For what, said he, are we now called upon to remove from this place? He was not about to say whether this place was the best that could have been selected for the Seat of Government. On that question he said he should not know what course to give to his own vote. But the question of removal at this moment was a very different one. Are we now called on, said he, to strike the standard of the nation? To say to the enemy, you have been here once, and may come again? No, sir; let us rally around it. The enemy, indeed, had once been here, and for his part he wished they might attempt to come again. It was time enough for Congress to move when they were in sight. He should doubt whether the honorable members of this House would then flee before them. Having assisted in calling the nation to war, he was ready to take part in it himself. He would rather sit under canvass in the city than remove one mile out of it to a palace. There had been no strength measured with the enemy in defending this place, and he would not, by deserting it, give him more credit than he had derived. The men of this District, led by proper officers, would, he believed, always do their duty and defend their city. Do we see any danger? Do you wish to examine the Faculty to know whether you are safe here? Or the Clergy to know if they will consent to pay the proper attention to those who could not get away in case the enemy should a second time visit the place? He hoped no committee would be raised on the subject. When the enemy were at the gate, it would be time enough to abandon their posts.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he hoped,

Removal of the Seat of Government.

H. OF R.

before the question was taken, he should be allowed to take a calm and dispassionate view of it. He agreed entirely with the gentleman from North Carolina, that whoever voted from personal motives on this question, whether for or against it, deserved condemnation. Although, said Mr. G., I might have personal or local feelings on the occasion, they shall not operate if I can throw them from me. I will look entirely to the good of the nation in the vote I am about to give. Mr. G. said he viewed the proposed temporary removal as no violation of the public faith. If it was, the public faith was so violated in 1794, when the President alone was authorized to change the place of meeting. Gentlemen had said, if the Government once began to roll, it would never return. Is this the true and proper place for the Seat of Government? If it be, how can gentlemen say it will not return immediately after the causes for its present removal shall cease? It will. The Seat of Government will in such case gravitate as certainly to this position as the needle to the pole. All the arguments, therefore, against the removal, on the ground that it would be permanent, ought to be thrown out of consideration, as they had nothing to do with the question. Let the resolution take its course and go to a committee. Suppose at the time Congress met, that the enemy could have held the place, or was in force on the water to occupy the place the next day. Would Congress, in such a case, attempt to sit here? The question was not, however, whether any exigency would justify the removal from this place, because that principle has been long ago decided by the passage of the act to which he had before alluded; the question was, whether this was such an exigency as to require the removal? He saw no reason, therefore, why the adoption of the question should excite such a feeling as appeared to prevail, unless gentlemen were desirous to place their argument on the ground they had unguardedly disclosed, that this was the very worst place in the nation for Congress to sit in. The idea of the gentleman from South Carolina was singular, who conceived that a removal would be striking our colors. Wait, says the gentleman, till the enemy comes and chases you off! That, said Mr. G., is the dishonor which I dread from remaining, the very disgrace I wish to avoid. You now sit coolly and deliberately; you may remove without disgrace or dishonor. But if this be a point which you cannot defend against an enemy, why talk like children about remaining here and having your heads cut off rather than remove? The gentleman from Tennessee, comparing the city to a farm, says, if his house was burned, he would not therefore move off his farm. But suppose a neighbor would politely offer him a clean bed, excellent food, and proper utensils for cooking and providing for his wants, would he refuse the use of them and rather sleep in his barn? The occupation of this city was one of the events of war, and was anticipated last Summer, when it was the subject of secret debate. To remove from the city temporarily was one of those occurrences in life to which we must submit, and is no more disgrace than the ordering the necessary retreat of an army. If it shall appear folly to remain here, this is the moment to remove. If we are to stay here till the enemy comes, to sit and be dragged from our seats, the President stolen—and there is nothing now to guard against it; if we are to run all risks for false honor, let us have no argument; let us say at once we will be self-devoted. This war, gentlemen well knew, might continue for years. If a peace did not take place now, he feared it would be long before it did. What, then, was the condition of the Government in this District? Let gentlemen ask themselves fairly. Were they willing to appropriate the money of the people of the United States to build a Capitol, to plant it in this District, where it might be destroyed in twenty days? No, gentlemen said, they would defend it, at an expense of ten or twelve millions; for that much it would cost, so indefensible is this point. Did not the interest of the country, Mr. G. asked, require them to remove to a place of security, where it would not be necessary to expend ten or fifteen millions, or any other sum, in the simple defence of Congress? Would gentlemen say that Congress were safe without an army to protect them? No. For it was well known that, without such a protection, the frigates may be thrown up the river and drive Congress off. Were gentlemen ready to divert the public money from the great object of prosecuting the war, to raise an army solely for defending this place? Mr. G. slightly noticed the inconvenience of this place to the members; the want of information, &c. Where were they to go for libraries? Would gentlemen appropriate thousands and thousands to obtain another library to replace that which was burnt by the enemy? These inconveniences, added to insecurity, urged the immediate removal of Congress. He said he had steered clear of all idea of permanent removal, for he was not one of those who yielded to the opinion that, after removal to any other place, the impropriety of returning to this place will be so palpable that they could never obtain a vote for it. Indeed, if gentlemen desired it, he was, for one, willing to give a pledge, in case of the removal, in the act itself, to return here at the close of the war.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, the chairman of the Military Committee, made a very succinct and clear statement of the defences provided and about to be provided for the city. [This statement, however proper and necessary to be presented to the House, is not deemed by the reporter to be proper for publication, and is therefore omitted.]

Mr. T. concluded by observing that it was the opinion of those qualified to judge, and indeed it was his opinion, that the city was entirely protected from assault by land, and soon would be by water.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, rose to offer a few ideas to the House, which he said had occurred to him since the subject had been presented this morning. Granting to gentlemen premises they had taken, and ceding the justice of a part of their reasoning, when tested and made applicable to the real question, neither one nor the other appeared to him to lead to the conclusions they had drawn. Cede the Constitutional question that the Seat of Government might be removed by Congress; cede too that there is some cause for this removal; we have yet to inquire, said he, whether or not this is an exigency requiring removal, and then, whether we can remove advantageously. First, as to the causes of removal. What are they? Famine? An invading army? Neither. An invading army has indeed penetrated to the city, and what have they done? With traits of barbarity better suited to Vandals than to Britons, they sacked a few buildings, and retired so precipitately, abandoned it so disgracefully as to leave many of their most valuable officers and soldiers even slightly wounded in our hands. Where now is that enemy? Is he at Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York—or where is he? Perhaps, if Congress were to decide on removing, the first step would bring them to face that incurious foe whose approach gentlemen appeared to dread. When the emergency did exist, Mr. H. said he would go with gentlemen in seeking out a place of greater security. But at this moment, he could but view this as a question of panic. Remove now, said he, and what spectacle will you exhibit to the community? The enemy has retreated in such a manner as to induce no belief of his desire to return. The enterprise which made him master of this city was desperate in its character, and marked by a degree of bravery amounting to rashness; and every one will admit that had the energies of the Government been properly brought into action, he would have retreated with much greater loss. Nay, Mr. H. said, he would venture to assert, that three thousand brave men, led and kept in action, would have prevented the enemy from entering the capital; and that one thousand men in the Capitol alone with musketry would have defended the Capitol against the invaders. Grant that Congress has the power to remove the Seat of Government. Had the emergency occurred? Had the enemy presented that formidable attitude to require their flight from the Capitol? Was the enemy even at hand? Had he footing even in the borders of our country? No, even there he was flying before a small undisciplined force: the patriotic volunteers of New York and Vermont, one fourth the number of the enemy, had driven him before them. Just at this moment, too, when we are gaining most splendid victories over them in their own territory, he could not see the reason for removal from our capital. It must be a feeling of panic only which recommends it, and he would not consent to exhibit it to his or any other country. What trophy could the enemy exhibit from his visit to this place? It would be asked in Europe, what blood had been spilt in its defence—who had fallen? It would be seen the Government was again pursuing its course, unawed and uninterrupted. He would not give the world reason to say otherwise by the removal of the Government from this place. If this was false pride, if this was false honor, Mr. H. said, let him thus ever maintain what he believed to be the real honor of the nation, of which some gentlemen had so lightly spoken. When the emergency does exist, the people will sanction the removal, but not till then. If the danger does exist, and there is an incompetent force for repelling it, said Mr. H., as gentlemen on the other side aver, let them take care that this nation, that other nations, and posterity, do not make some strong inquiries of them. Have they gone hand in hand with the Executive in making provision of the means for our defence? If this error did exist, Mr. H. said he was unwilling to add others to it. He was unwilling to add one disgrace to another, by flying now from that enemy who has so precipitately fled from us. The feelings of gentlemen were warm from seeing the situation of their Capitol, and he feared they were too much influenced by them. When danger is proved, Mr. H. said he should deem himself unwise if he did not go with gentlemen in voting for removal. But as to the inconvenience spoken of, it was certainly more nominal than real. If local considerations were to prevail in favor of removal to any other place, he thought it would not be difficult to show, go where they will, Congress will produce a pressure on a majority of that community. It was true that prominent men may take advantage of it, but it will operate as a prejudice to the people generally among whom Congress locate themselves. Remove from here momentarily or otherwise, and every prospect of the people of this city is blasted and withered. In voting for a removal, under present circumstances, he believed Congress would violate the national faith, sacrifice thousands and thousands of people who ought to be protected, and exhibit a panic to an enemy from whom we have nothing to fear, and who has of his own accord precipitately abandoned our territory.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, next spoke. He said, that if indeed the enemy had abandoned our country at every point, it could not be justly supposed that Congress would be influenced by a panic in removing from this place. If the enemy be entirely out of view, this question may be discussed without that sort of feeling which some appear to entertain of it. Mr. O. said he would endeavor never to debate with feeling or passion, which was not at all conducive to inquiry into truth. If they could not approach this question without appeals to the passions and fears of the members, it certainly was no proof of its indisputable inexpediency. He was well aware, he said, of the interest which this District felt in the decision of this question; but it was proper that that interest should be manifested in a becoming manner. It was proper that considerations of this kind should have their proper influence; but when he heard gentlemen tell the House that by a temporary removal they would ruin thousands and thousands of individuals, he must believe it mere fanciful declamation. It was true, that a removal might injure individuals; but he presumed no gentleman in the House would hesitate to make a fair and liberal compensation by way of indemnity to such sufferers. It was a cardinal point in his politics, Mr. O. said, that the national faith should be preserved inviolate, even when improperly pledged, unless where considerations of a paramount nature forbade it. Gentlemen had talked about the national faith—but were they not aware that national contracts frequently cannot be fulfilled in the spirit in which they are made; and would they say that there might not be cases in which necessity would impose on them a course different from that pursued in ordinary cases? As to the expediency of removal, this was a mere proposition for inquiry, and if on inquiry it should appear that Congress cannot be more easily protected from the enemy, and better accommodated elsewhere, the arguments of gentlemen would apply, &c. &c. No temporary removal, Mr. O. said, would be a violation of the national faith. When we speak of a permanent seat of Government in the most literal sense, we speak of it subject to casualties. As to the panic alleged, were the enemy at our doors, the remark might be correct, but not otherwise. While, however, Mr. O. said he would not remove at present under the impulse of fear, he would not remain from false courage. There was courage of one kind, and courage of another kind—the one animating the soldier in the fight, the other fortifying the citizen in the discharge of his duties. To be sure, members of Congress might put themselves on a par with the miserable wretches who fill the ranks of the enemy, and march forth to battle. But when we are sent here, said he, it is to legislate, to provide the ways and means to pay those who are to fight. Whilst we transact the business of legislators, and put means into others hands to carry on the war, we are in the line of our duty. On some occasions it is glorious to gentlemen to take up arms and maintain the principles they have asserted by their votes; and there were some in this House who could boast of having done so; but, in general, legislation required tranquillity and separation from other duties. The incursion of the enemy, he said, instead of affording reasons against a removal of the Seat of Government, afforded conclusive arguments in favor of it. It had certainly shown one thing: that this was not a proper situation for the Seat of Government, because it is owing to the forbearance of the enemy that Congress had now a single roof to cover their heads whilst deliberating on the concerns of the nation. He called upon gentlemen to say whether it would be proper to remain at a place where the public documents were so much exposed to destruction, unless protected at an expense which was most disproportionate to the object. The gentleman from Georgia said the place was defensible. They had been told so always. They had been told so by the constituted authorities, as far as they could speak, at the moment when the enemy invaded the Capital. As to the defence by the militia, the force which is destined for the defence of this District as had been stated to this House, it was at once the most expensive and least efficient force. Notwithstanding the great services they had sometimes rendered, Mr. O. said he could have no dependence on the militia. It ought not to be tolerated, when every means ingenuitly could devise was stretched to the utmost extent to prosecute the war, that Congress should sit here at such a cost. The enemy had retreated precipitately from this place, Mr. O. admitted, but they had immediately attacked another city; and our Government had been officially given to understand, that the enemy intended to pursue this course. He would not rely, therefore, on the forbearance or inability of an enemy who were both able and willing to annoy us. It was not disgraceful to feel alarm at the exposed situation of the place. The exposure was brought upon us by the war. Every point could not be defended; and Congress would deserve the meed of wisdom and prudence for removing hence, if by a removal they could be better accommodated, relieve the finances from the enormous burden of defending the city by a militia force, and at the same time relieve the city by taking from it the only object which could endanger its invasion by the enemy. Gentlemen discussed this question as if the Seat of Government was proposed to be finally removed, and said that such would be the practical effect of the temporary removal. Gentlemen had no right to say so. No such design was expressed or implied by the mover of the resolution; and it could only result, if at all, from the inherent circumstances of the case. If circumstances should make a permanent removal necessary, it must take place; and if the Constitution was in the way, it ought to be amended. Whatever respect he might feel for the inhabitants of the District, he would say that their interest could not for a moment enter into competition with the interests of this nation. It should never be permitted that a few thousand inhabitants should rise and say they would be ruined, if the nation could be benefitted, provided the nation indemnified them for their loss. The people of the District are liable to suffer with all others the evils resulting from war. The temporary removal of the Government, is such an evil. The people of the city ought to have confidence enough in the honor of the nation to believe that, if the Government removed, they would be fully indemnified for any loss they might sustain.

Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, moved to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the motion, and supported his motion by a speech, the substance of which was, that though he entertained very great contempt for the citizens of Washington, which he expressed in the most pointed language, he was opposed to a removal at this moment, as being derogatory to the national dignity and honor.

The motion for postponement was negatived—yeas 48, nays 79, as follows:

MR. FISK, of New York, MR. MCKIM, MR. BURWELL, MR. GROSVENOR, MR. INGHAM, MR. HAWKINS, and MR. DANA, were appointed the committee pursuant to the said resolution.

TUESDAY, September 27.

Two other members, to wit: from Connecticut, LYMAN LAW, and from Virginia, JOHN P. HUNGERFORD, appeared, and took their seats.

MR. JACKSON, of Virginia, presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of West Liberty in Virginia, and its vicinity, stating their opinion that the transportation and opening of the mail on Sunday is injurious to the morals of the community, and praying that it may be abolished in future.—Referred to the Committee on Post Roads and Post Offices.

MR. KING, of Massachusetts, advertent to the law passed in 1813, allowing a bounty for prisoners taken by private armed vessels, remarked that, by recent decisions of the proper authority, it appeared that the provisions of this act did not extend to the cases of recapture by private armed vessels, certainly a meritorious class of cases, and equally entitled, with others, to remuneration for their enterprises. To collect the sense of the House on the propriety of extending this provision to embrace such cases, he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act entitled, "An act allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews, of the private armed vessels of the United States," passed on the 2d of August, 1813, to such officers and crews of merchant vessels of the United States as have recaptured, or may recapture, the same from the enemy.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

MR. JACKSON, of Virginia, said it would be recollected that at the last session he had the honor to propose a resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States. He now renewed it, that it might be decided on during the present session of Congress. He then offered a motion to amend the Constitution, embracing the following propositions:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as amendments to the Constitution of the United States; each of which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution:

1. Congress shall have power to lay a tax or duty, not exceeding ten per centum ad valorem, on articles exported from any State.

2. Congress shall have power to make roads in any State.

3. Congress shall have power to make canals in any State, with the consent of the State within which the same shall be made.

4. Congress shall have power to establish a National Bank, with branches thereof, in any State.

MR. JACKSON moved to refer these propositions to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and gave notice that he should call for the consideration of the last of them on Friday next.

MR. FISK, of New York, called for a division of the question on the reference of these propositions to a Committee of the Whole. He said he should vote for the reference of the first three, but against the reference of the last, and assigned his reasons for discriminating between them. The first three, he said, were of an important nature, and would require mature deliberation and discussion before acted on, and he should probably vote for them. As to the fourth, he saw himself no occasion for it; and, if it were not indelicate in itself, after the precedents and numerous adjudications of twenty years, to propose giving to Congress a power to do that they have already done, it was at least in his view unnecessary. He objected to it, moreover, because the agitation of the question might interfere with the decision of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petition referred to them for the establishment of a National Bank. In the present situation of our affairs, the advantages which such an institution offered to the community were, he believed, more seriously felt and generally admitted than they had ever been before; and he hoped this proposition would not be thrown in the way of a decision on the subject. He was indeed much surprised to see this proposition revived at the present session, of the intention to do which he had no knowledge or information until he heard it read.

Mr. JACKSON said he had not indeed informed the gentleman of his intention to renew this proposition, because he had too much respect for this body to offer to its consideration any motion which, without consultation with others, he was not determined to persevere in. He might retort on the gentleman by saying that he (Mr. F.) did not inform him of his intention to remove the Seat of Government from this place; and the gentleman could not be more surprised at the proposition now offered than Mr. J. had been at the motion for that object yesterday moved by Mr. FISK. He regretted that the gentleman had on this occasion departed from the regular rule of reference of all motions similar to this; and the more so, as a refusal to refer the proposition could not preclude its discussion. Mr. J. denied the indelicacy imputed to his motion on account of former precedents recognising the power he proposed to vest in Congress; if there were indelicacy anywhere, he should suppose it to exist at least as much in the presentation of a petition to Congress for the establishment of a National Bank, after they had, in their refusal to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States, decided against the constitutionality of it. It is a fortunate thing for this country that Congress is not enchained by precedent in its legislation; that, if the Constitution be violated to-day, it is no reason why it should be violated to-morrow. The question of renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States was argued on the Constitutional ground; many of the States have by a solemn vote declared that Congress does not possess the power to pass such an act, and it would be respectful at least to consult their opinions on the subject. Mr. J. did not at the last session, he did not now, say whether such a power was or was not already possessed by Congress; but he wished to place that power beyond question or doubt, because he believed it was a power they ought to possess.

Mr. FISK said that the gentleman had mistaken him if he supposed that it was his desire that he (Mr. J.) should communicate to Mr. F. every proposition he desired to submit. He knew that from the situation of members in this city, living in houses scattered over a surface of several miles, it was utterly impossible that they should consult together on the subjects of legislation before they were introduced into the House, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, said he hoped this proposition would be suffered to go to a committee. The subject had been fully discussed and decided two or three years ago, on the proposition to renew the charter of the United States' Bank, which had failed, though under the auspices of the then Secretary of the Treasury, who possessed so greatly the confidence of the people, and justly too, because of the ability with which he managed the affairs of the nation. However necessary a National Bank may now be, having conscientiously voted it to be unconstitutional, he could not now vote for it without an amendment. Nor had the unconstitutionality of the old bank law been pronounced on light authority; the opinions of the late and present President of the United States were recorded against it. He hoped, therefore, the proposition would be permitted to take the usual course of going to a committee.

The question on the reference of Mr. JACKSON's motion to a Committee of the whole House, was then decided in the affirmative: For reference 61, against it 53.

WEDNESDAY, September 28.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, ABIAH BIGELOW, and TIMOTHY PICKERING; from Vermont, EZRA BUTLER; and from Pennsylvania, HUGH GLASGOW, appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. SHERWOOD presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Cairo, in the State of New York, praying that the mails may not be opened or carried on the Sabbath day.—Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. HALL, the Committee of Claims were directed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the payment of private property lost, killed, or destroyed, while employed in the service of the United States.

BOUNTY TO DESERTERS.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, said he believed it was the practice of the British commanders, on land and water, to use every means in their power to induce our men to desert their guns. A direct retaliation of such practices would doubtless be justifiable. But, Mr. F. said, the resolution he was about to submit had a different motive. It was well known that desertions from the enemy were very frequent, and that those deserters were strangers in our country, without means of employment, or of purchasing lands on which to labor for an honest livelihood. It was as well known that we have an extensive frontier, much exposed, and a great quantity of wild lands, the settlement of which would be very desirable. In order to authorize an inquiry into the expediency of disposing of this species of persons, so that they might be useful rather than burdensome to the community, he proposed the following resolve:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving to each deserter from the British army, during the present war, one hundred acres of the public lands, such deserter actually settling the same; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The question to take this motion into consideration, the yeas and nays having been required by Mr. OAKLEY, was decided—For consideration 82, against it 45, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Chappell, Clark, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Eppes, Evans, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kershaw, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Murfree, Newton, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Caperton, Cooper, Cox, Davenport, Duvall, Earle, Ely, Farrow, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Post, John Reed, Ruggles, Sherman, Smith of Virginia, Stockton, Sturges, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, and Winter.

On the suggestion of Mr. McKee, of Kentucky, the resolution was amended, so as to refer the subject to the Committee on Military Affairs, within the scope of whose duties it appeared to him more properly to come.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the passage of the resolution—

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, said he had asked for the yeas and nays on the question of considering this resolution, to mark his opposition to it in every stage. With deep regret, he might truly say, had he seen this resolution before the House. He had hoped, to whatever extent of sacrifice Congress might determine to go in the prosecution of this war, although we might all agree to lay down our lives and fortunes in its support, we shall still retain something like national honor. He was sorry to see a proposition before this House which he considered to be levelled at the root of it. He did not speak from extensive knowledge, but he believed he was justified in saying it was the only proposition of the kind ever submitted to any legislature. He did not know, at least, that it had ever entered into the scope of policy of this Government to encourage the commission of crime by those most likely to perpetrate it. The ranks of the enemy were known to be filled by ragamuffins of all descriptions; and, by the adoption of such a measure as that proposed by this resolution, we should make a direct appeal to the worst passions of the worst men. Are we reduced to this? Have we not resources to maintain an open and manly contest without appealing to this most unheard of and disgraceful course? If such policy were pursued by the Government, he should forever despair of a successful issue to the contest in which we are engaged. He hoped gentlemen would reflect deeply on this subject, before they gave their consent to this inquiry. If considerations sufficiently powerful to arrest the measure do not press upon the feelings of men, it would be in vain for him to urge them. There were, he said, some propositions which outraged at once so greatly all the feelings of honor and propriety, that it seemed unnecessary to oppose them by argument. Since the resolution had been introduced, there must be some reasons to urge or justify its adoption. But could the invitation to and encouragement of treason come fairly within the scope of our views? Shall the United States, after having year after year held out their conduct as an example of public faith and honor; after arraigning the enemy at the bar of nations for his disregard of justice, and for his violations of the rules of warfare; shall the United States, after all this, go as far beyond the enemy in his violations of the usages of war, as he has gone beyond all other nations? Shall we, by so doing, draw a veil over the atrocity of his acts, and place us on an eminence of guilt which no nation ever before reached? He called upon gentlemen, by their regard for their own honor and the character of the nation, to stop this proposition in its outset. The House, by their vote to consider the resolution, had already gone too far in sanctioning a proposition which strikes at the root of those principles which bind together the civilized world. It would be to offer a bounty to treason. He did not know to what it might lead. There was enough of bitterness and animosity already infused into this war. Our enemy now affect (for affectation he must suppose it) to accuse us of a violation of the usages of civilized warfare, and presume to place their severest measures on the ground of retaliation. Adopt this measure, and they are justified for every measure of atrocity to which they may think fit to resort. It will not be in your mouths hereafter to complain of the burning and ravaging of your towns, or of the unreasonable rupture of negotiations. He called upon gentlemen, then, to reflect whether the adoption of this measure would not infuse into the present contest a temper which will defeat all hopes of an early peace.

Mr. Fisk, of Vermont, denied that this proposition was of the character ascribed to it; and said that he was not conscious of possessing a disposition to sanction any such measure. What does the motion propose? That the deserters coming among us, instead of becoming nuisances to society, may be provided with the means of becoming good citizens. But, says the gentleman from New York, this is a violation of all principle. I have never understood that nations at peace with each other were precluded from receiving each other's deserters; and is it understood, that, when you are at war, we may not provide the means of support for those who desert from our enemy? Did gentlemen desire, in order to maintain this ideal national dignity, this high standing among nations, that we should return to the enemy those deserters who came within our lines? Would the gentleman from New York advocate such a measure? And which is more criminal, if criminality can attach to such conduct, to foster them when coming among you in time of peace, or provide the means necessary to prevent their being a burden to the community in time of war? If we take the first step of receiving deserters, why not take the other which is now proposed? But the gentleman had said, this would be inviting deserters from the enemy. Mr. F. said they were already invited by the nature of our institutions, by the freedom and protection they afforded to strangers. And would the gentleman change our form of Government, lest in its present shape it should tempt the soldiers of the enemy to desert? The resolution proposes to introduce no new principle. We do now receive deserters; and there is no gentleman who will rise in his place and move that all deserters be sent back. The gentleman supposes the measure to be without precedent. Let the gentleman read Lord Wellington's proclamation while in Spain, offering a bounty to every deserter from the French army of twelve crowns. This precedent had been set by the very nation with whom we are at war. Admiral Cockburn, too, had not long ago published a proclamation to all who wished to leave the country to appoint a place of rendezvous, and he would furnish the means to carry them off. Look also at General Brisbane's proclamation to the people of Vermont and New York, inviting them all to stay at home, in other words, to desert the standard of their country, and to furnish his army with provisions, &c. Gentlemen might even look back to times of peace, and see similar conduct on the part of the enemy. During the existence of our embargo law, which was very oppressive in its operation on our present enemy, though, to be sure, his friends in this country spoke very lightly of its effect, they invited our citizens to violate it, offering them protection and safe conduct in so doing, not only to any British port, but to any port whatever. Whatever new distinctions may be drawn on this head, yet, if we look at the effect of measures, a more direct invitation to rebellion, even in time of peace with us, could not be imagined. From some cause or other, a great deal of sensibility was always exhibited in this House when certain subjects were touched. The House was told again and again to beware of provoking the enemy's wrath. This kind of false sensibility was, Mr. F. said, fast vanishing. Ask the citizens of Plattsburg, Buffalo, Havre-de-Grace, Hampton, Georgetown, and this place, whether they had rather the war should be carried into the enemy's territories or he should be permitted to carry it into ours. They would one and all decide in favor of the former. The people begin to find we are at war with a nation whom no considerations of peculiar modesty or generosity prevent from carrying into effect any measures to which her power is adequate. Still, however, could dishonor attach in any way to the measure which he proposed, he would not support it. But even humanity demanded such a provision. The deserters from the enemy now infesting our cities were at once a burden to themselves and a nuisance to society; but, planted on our frontiers, they would not only form a barrier against savage incursions, but would become useful citizens. Mr. F. compared the advantages of thus diminishing the enemy's effective force with the expense of doing it in any other way, and drew a conclusion favorable to his motion. He was determined to support this war by every proper and honorable measure; and he considered this one of that description. Desertions from the enemy, he said, were daily and numerous. Something like five or six hundred men had already deserted from the enemy at Plattsburg—many of them useful, enterprising men, who wish to become citizens. My wish, said Mr. F., is to make them useful, by giving them the means of support by honest industry.

Bounty to Deserters.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said, that as he was bound to believe that any gentleman who made a motion in this House considered it honorable and proper, when he pronounced the measure, now proposed, to be dishonest, dishonorable and inexpedient, he did not mean to reflect personally on those who moved or advocated it. He did think so, and he did conceive also that the suggestions offered against them by the gentleman from New York had been in no degree met by the mover. Had they been met? The gentleman talked about the crimes of Britain; and seemed to infer because she had violated principle in one way, we might in another. This resolution would indeed at once reduce us to the same depth of guilt in which the gentlemen say our enemy is wallowing. The measure embraced in the motion before the House, being in the nature of retaliation, was different from all other such measures. It was wicked in itself, because it encouraged crime. It could not therefore be justified on that ground, nor indeed on any other. For his part, Mr. G. said, he had voted against the consideration of the motion, because in principle it was wrong, and therefore he would not even inquire into it. Without regard, he said, to the insinuation of particular sensibilities, the usual cant in this House, on such occasions, he should candidly discuss this question. If he knew himself, he observed, there was not a gentleman on the floor who would go further than he would at this moment, to rescue the country from the dangers which environ it, to repel the foe that tramples on the soil. But, let the danger be what it would, unless the existence of the nation was absolutely in jeopardy, he could not, under any pretence, consent to prostrate its honor and dignity by plunging into crime. The question, then, arose whether the proposed measure was or was not of a criminal nature; and this question he wished fairly to consider. What was this proposition which was to be adopted as a national principle, as a portion of our national morality, to stamp our character, now and forever? He asked gentlemen to say if they would, by adopting this proposition, offer a bounty for the commission of crime? Let gentlemen look into the books on national law, they will find desertion to be an offence of so black a dye that not even enemies are to encourage it. It is an offence in regard to which it is a common expression, that men love the treason but hate the traitor. A nation must receive the traitor, but hates him at the same time; because the crime of deserting the allegiance which a man owes to his country, is one of the deepest dye, one which you are daily punishing with death on your frontier. It is now proposed to offer a bounty on an offence, to which your own laws have decreed the punishment of death. Why stop here? Why not offer a bounty to every man who commits treason of any kind? Why stop here? Why not at once adopt the principles of the Old Man of the Mountain, as he is called, and offer a bounty for the assassination of the King, Governors and Generals of your enemy? Why stop short by giving a bounty on desertion? Why not at once give a bounty for the assassination of every man in your enemy's camp, and pay the perpetrators of the crime when their daggers reek with their blood? There is little or no distinction, in principle, between these offences. Mr. G. repeated that he was ready, and gentlemen would find it in his conduct, to travel every honorable length in defending his country. But nothing short of preserving the independence of the country, and not till that independence was prostrate on the ground, could induce him to adopt a measure, embracing a principle like this. And what would gentlemen gain by it? It was already universally understood that the soldiers of the enemy deserted whenever they could. But say, that by this measure we gained ten thousand men—would it be a feather in the scale; would this indemnify us for the black disgrace which it would stamp on the very forehead of the country? But look at the further consequences, said he. Believe you that the enemy will not retaliate? That after you have committed this crime against human nature, she would not enter the Southern department of your country, and kindle a fire which you could not quench? This she had not yet attempted, though she had the power. Believe you she would not capture your unoffending citizens on the ocean, and keep them as hostages till you delivered up those whom you had enticed away? Yes, sir, she would not stay her arm. Look at a further consequence of such a measure. We are to settle these ragamuffins on our frontiers. Was there a man who believed that these men, who were picked from the jails of Europe, these sixpenny men, would settle down as farmers? No; they were men of dissolute lives, men not acquainted with the useful arts. Mr. G. said he would not offer inducements to such poor wretches to commit a crime, for which, if detected, they would suffer death. The gentleman had talked of humanity; was there any humanity in this? In its consequences, as well as its principles, it is utterly objectionable. Whenever the nation is pushed to the last extremity, such a measure might present a question for consideration; but we are not driven to this extremity. This country is abundantly capable of defence. Let its means be brought forth; the people are ready and willing to raise their arms in its defence. There was no occasion for such degrading measures as this.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, commenced some remarks by saying, that on all subjects requiring the deliberation of Congress, he was pleased to see a sentiment of jealous regard for the national honor and character pervading the House, and felt disposed to allow the sincerity and candor of every gentleman who made professions of it. After hearing very attentively, however, all that had been said on this subject, and giving due credit to the ingenuity of gentlemen, whose arguments are certainly very specious, his mind had not been convinced but that the measure now proposed to the House perfectly comported with the national honor. It was true, indeed, that when we consult the conduct of nations, and those usages which have the force of laws, we shall find many traits that do not quadrate entirely with the principles deemed honorable in social life. But, in considering subjects of this kind, we must disentangle our minds from the consideration of municipal laws which have no bearing on this subject. Treason is a crime of the highest grade against the nation to which the traitor belongs. To withdraw allegiance from one nation and transfer it to that nation's enemy, during war, is treason against the sovereign authority to which allegiance was due. But how ought we to consider this crime? Though a crime against a man's own country, it is no crime against that to which he deserts. The desertion of a soldier from our enemy is surely no crime against the United States, and therefore, as to us, no crime at all. Mr. S. examined at some length the nature of allegiance and of the obligations it imposed. To screen a criminal of any kind was participating in his crime, and becoming accessory after the fact; but it had been the practice of all nations to receive deserters from their enemies, and to permit them to settle among them if they behaved as good citizens ought to do. The nice principles of honor the gentlemen had laid down, extended far enough, would impose on a nation the necessity of restoring to an enemy his deserters, and enabling him to punish their offence with death. If, however, as public law exists, we may give them aid and comfort, and afford them an asylum, we may as well add to other inducements as those which, the gentleman says, already operate so powerfully on the soldiers of our enemy. In so doing, the principle, which is not controverted, is extended but little further than at present, and in its moral consequences is certainly not so enlarged as to affect the national honor. The force of the enemy's examples had been passed over in silence by the gentleman, and their correctness tacitly admitted—their authority being denied only by the general intimation that such conduct was contrary to national law. The proposed measure therefore derived strength from the preceding conduct of the enemy. But, examine all history, ancient and modern, what had been the usual course of all nations at war? To weaken the hands of their opponents and strengthen the hands of themselves. Perhaps precedents derived from the Revolutionary war might not be considered by gentlemen as bearing on this point, since Britain then claimed us as her colonies. Recollect, however, her proclamations inviting our citizens to withdraw from their allegiance. Our history, it is true, is not ample, owing to the recency of its date. But it will be recollected that in the war with Tripoli, our gallant officer conducting the war on the land united himself on that occasion with a pretender to the Tripolitan throne, and took advantage of his rebellion to divide the forces of the enemy. Who censured that act? Who blamed Eaton for his conduct? Yet it was thus only the Dey was compelled to come to terms which he had before refused. This measure was clearly distinguishable from a bounty for assassination, to which it had been likened. Employing persons secretly to kill an enemy was a warfare worthy only of savages; it was an unmanly way of getting rid of those whom an army dare not meet in a field of battle. But to withdraw soldiers from an enemy's standard was not of this character, and was besides more correct under present circumstances, inasmuch as the enemy's army is not composed of soldiers of his own country, but of soldiers from Germany and other countries—men who owe no national allegiance to Britain, but are mere mercenaries in her ranks—who fight for those who pay them best. They are calculated to be the most dangerous enemies, but are willing to desert their leaders and join our standard on sufficient inducements. If they employ men owing them no allegiance, have we not a right to withdraw them if we can, and employ them to strengthen our own frontier? As to the objection that they would not settle, that objection is refuted by the terms of the resolution, which require actual settlement on the land. Let gentlemen acquainted with the Revolutionary war recollect how many of the good citizens of Pennsylvania and other States were deserters from the British ranks, Hessians, Germans, &c., and have become among our best and wealthiest and most useful citizens. Mr. S. concluded by observing that this was a clear question of expediency, perfectly within the scope of our policy, not contrary to national honor, merited the attention of the House, and ought to be referred as proposed to one of its committees.

After rejecting a motion made by Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, to lay the motion on the table, the question on its adoption was determined: For the motion 80, against it 55, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Chappell, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Eppes, Evans, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Leferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Murefree, Newton, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

So it was adopted by the House.

HONOR TO THE BRAVE.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, in introducing the following motion, adverted to the unpropitious events attending the commencement of the war, the more mortifying because unexpected, which had caused to be overlooked by the National Councils some displays of valor and military skill which deserved the notice of Congress. This omission had been the more marked because of the almost unlimited plaudits during the same time bestowed on the officers of the Navy, &c. Had the nation noticed by civil honors the merits of a Pike, a Taylor, a Croghan, a Miller, and some others, perhaps they would have done but sheer justice. But his object in rising now was to present a motion limited in its character, and confined to objects which must meet the approbation of the House. The resolution he proposed, and which he had hoped some other member would before now have offered, was in the following words:

Resolved, That the thanks of the United States, in Congress assembled, be presented to Generals Brown, Scott, and Gaines, and their companions in fame.

Resolved, That General Brown be requested to communicate to the other officers and soldiers under his command the thanks of the United States in Congress, and the high sense of gratitude entertained for victories so splendid, achieved in contests so unequal.

Considerable desultory debate took place on this motion, not in opposition to the principle, but from difference of opinion as to the mode.

Mr. OAKLEY moved to commit the same to the Committee of Military Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of returning the thanks of Congress to such other officers and soldiers of the United States as may have distinguished themselves during the present war.

A motion was made by Mr. SHARP, to amend the motion of Mr. OARLEY, by inserting, after the word "Congress," the following: "with such other testimonials of the national approbation, as said committee shall deem advisable."

A motion was then made by Mr. LOWNDES, to postpone, until Monday next, the further consideration of the resolutions; which was agreed to.

THURSDAY, September 29.

Another member, to wit: from Virginia, JOHN CLOPTON, appeared, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the copy of a resolution, transmitted under cover to him from Philadelphia, passed by the Select and Common Council of that city, offering to Congress and Government the use of buildings in that city, for their accommodation, provided it shall be deemed expedient, in consequence of inconvenience experienced from the destruction of the Capitol, &c.—Referred to the committee already raised on that subject.

Mr. LATTIMORE, of Massachusetts, from the select committee appointed on that subject, reported a bill further to extend the right of suffrage in the Mississippi Territory, and to increase the number of members of the Legislative Council for the same.—Twice read and committed.

No other business being offered for consideration, and none of the committees being ready to report, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, September 30.

Several other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, BRADBURY CILLEY; from New Jersey, JAMES SCHUREMAN; from Maryland, NICHOLAS R. MOORE; appeared, and took their seats.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, praying that certain companies of militia, called out for the defence of that Territory, may be paid by the United States.—Referred to the Secretary of War.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House, pursuant to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the proposition of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, to amend the Constitution. That part of the motion was taken up which goes to provide "That Congress shall have power to establish a National Bank, with branches thereof in any State."

Mr. JACKSON said he did not intend to repeat the remarks which he had made when this subject was last year before the Congress, or to say anything in anticipation of the remarks which might be made for or against this proposition. The utility of a National Bank had been demonstrated by every day's experience. We know at this day, said he, that some State banks which have stopped payment have not only refused to receive the notes of those which continue to cash their notes, but have forced their holders to sell them at ten per cent. discount in the brokers' shops. Independent of this fact, it was held by all gentlemen of all parties that it is necessary to the convenience of our fiscal operations that there should be a National Bank. The only difficulty opposed to the adoption of the proposition now under consideration would be on the part of those who believed that the power proposed to be vested, already resided in Congress, and who might contend that the passage of such a motion as this would by implication deny the present existence of the power. Mr. J. said that he did not himself believe that any gentleman would be committed in this way by voting for this proposition; that it was best in all cases the least doubtful of Constitutional construction to make assurance doubly sure. Many of the State Legislatures had declared their opinion that a law establishing a National Bank would be an unauthorized act. It would be better, to avoid all difficulties, to consult their opinions, or, if you please, their prejudices, and receive at their hand, by liberal grant, a power so essential to the well being of the country.

Mr. MCKEE, of Kentucky, said as he could not vote for the proposition, it was perhaps due to himself, as well as the Committee, to state his reasons for voting against it, and why he thought it ought not to be adopted. If it were to be adopted and sent out to the States for concurrence, would not the question of constitutionality, he asked, be completely yielded on the part of those who voted for it? Whether, as such a vote would be a disclaiming of the power by Congress, reason and probability did not altogether forbid the expectation that the States would relinquish this power to the General Government? A large majority of the States already had a deep interest in the banking establishments within their respective jurisdictions; and, so far as the paper and business of a National Bank extended, it must so far deteriorate the State bank stocks, and curtail the revenues therefrom on which some of the States entirely rely for the support of their governments. Besides this, the interest of the local banks extended through all the ramifications of society. Almost every individual in every Legislature was in some degree interested in the success and prosperity of the State banks, and would be interested to refuse to grant the power if it was once yielded by the House. The question presented in this form appears to propose a relinquishment of power, and will afford an opportunity on which the States will gladly seize to withhold from Congress the right of exercising this power. He did not believe that the question of renewal of the charter of the old United States Bank at all decided the question of the Constitutional power of Congress. The history of that bank, as found on the Journals of Congress, was this: that Congress, in 1791, by a very large majority of both branches, passed a law establishing a bank, which was sanctioned by President WASHINGTON, and went into operation; that it afterwards received the sanction of Congress under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, by the passage of laws establishing branches of it, and for the punishment of those who counterfeited its paper. It was a fact, that every member would concur with him in declaring, that many who voted against rechartering the bank, did so, not because they did not believe that Congress possessed the power, but because they believed the measure inexpedient. He hazarded nothing in saying that more than the number of the majority on that question entertained no Constitutional scruples on the subject. In the Senate the question was decided against renewing the charter by the casting vote of the President of that body, in which there were many who did not vote against it from Constitutional considerations. So far as any decision of Congress had authority, their decisions proved that Congress had the power. This subject had been so repeatedly discussed, that he supposed it would be useless to refer to the Constitution in relation to it. The question had become a point of political faith, and acquired the stability of some theological opinions, on which argument and reason were thrown away. He did not aspire to the ability to shake opinions of such long standing as he knew were entertained by some members of the House. But even the argument of the gentleman from Virginia this morning would prove the Constitutional power of Congress to establish a National Bank. The gentleman had informed the House that such a bank was necessary and indispensable for the convenient, faithful, and economical administration of the finances. Availing himself of this admission, and applying it to the general clause in the Constitution vesting powers in Congress, he contended no doubt could remain of the power being in Congress. By the Constitutional phrase "necessary and proper" was not meant an absolutely indispensable necessity, but any agency fitted, suited, applicable to, and connected with, the faithful administration of the finances. Every man not prejudiced must, by experience and the gentleman's admission, be convinced that Congress already have the power now proposed to be given to them. He then took a retrospective view of the operation of the refusal to recharter the old bank or establish a new one, and proved conclusively that the Government had been very greatly a loser, perhaps to the amount of four or five millions, by that omission—besides the reduced interests at which the facilities it afforded would have enabled the Government to obtain the loans they have since had occasion for. It was demonstrated that a bank of this description furnished facilities which no existing institution did; and it was therefore proved that its establishment was necessary and proper to the fiscal operations of the Government, and of course within the scope of their Constitutional power.

Mr. JACKSON said, it must have been observed, that he had on all occasions purposely avoided expressing his opinion on the constitutionality of any act to establish a National Bank. He did not consider the votes, however, during the time he had held a seat in the House, as recognising the power; for instance, he did not imagine that any person could be considered as sanctioning the institution referred to by voting to punish the counterfeiting the notes of the bank. Policy and every consideration dictated that an offence of this kind should be punished, and the law for that purpose was proposed without adverting at all to the Constitutional question. In regard to the question of establishing new branches to the bank, it was one of more difficulty. The Constitutional question, however, was not on that occasion stirred before Congress, and he believed the yeas and nays were not called on it. The charter of the Bank of the United States was limited in its duration; and whilst it was in existence, it was the duty, to say the least of it, of the constituted authorities to give to it efficacy, to punish offenders against it. The charter of that bank was like the contracts which the Government has made with the national creditors—of which he hoped, none in this House or nation, whatever he had heard to the contrary, would go so far as to say the national faith was not pledged to redeem the last shilling. So in regard to the charter of the Bank of the United States. Those who opposed it offered no obstacle to fulfilling it after it was granted. The gentleman had said the State Legislatures and individuals composing them would oppose the grant of any such power as this to the National Government. Once establish the almost indispensable utility and importance of a National Bank, and there would be such a direct appeal to the honor and patriotism of the State Legislatures as to forbid for a moment the idea that they would not sanction its creation. Their private interest would vanish before the national good. But even if this base and grovelling passion had influence, it would not prevent them from granting the power he proposed to ask from them. Mr. J. made some observations going to show that the advantage to the individual States from the establishment of banks within their limits would operate as a counterpoise to the effect of the collision of interest between a National Bank and the State Banks—because the branches so to be established would be a great advantage to the community in which they were located. The gentleman appeared to think the adoption of the proposition would be a virtual acknowledgment that we do not now possess the power proposed to be given. The Constitution, Mr. J. said, would never be destroyed by the omission to exercise in their fullest plenitude the powers expressly granted in it, &c. He adverted to the eloquent argument of Vice President Clinton, on giving his casting vote against the renewal of the charter of the old Bank of the United States, before the Senate, in which body it had been argued solely on the ground of constitutionality. The Constitution, Mr. J. further said, admitted of different constructions, about which the most learned and the most virtuous men differ; but if one violation were to be made a precedent for a subsequent and analogous violation, the Constitution would become a matter of convenience, instead of an instrument of obligation. He adverted to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means at the last session, on the subject of the National Bank, who had decided that Congress had no power to establish one. When the law passed establishing the old Bank of the United States there had existed much doubt as to its constitutionality; and General Washington withheld his signature for some days in consequence of it. The same doubts still existed; and yet, where they were most strongly entertained, he had heard of no objection to amending the Constitution so as to grant the power. Let us not, said he, refuse to avail ourselves of the advantage of such an institution, and of removing our own honest scruples, by refusing to apply to the States for a grant of the power. Mr. J. concluded by expressing his hope, though that hope was much weakened by the prospect, that his proposition would be agreed to.

After a few words of explanation by Mr. McKEE, the proposition was negatived in Committee, who reported their disagreement to the House.

The question on concurring with the Committee in their disagreement to the proposition, was then decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Avery, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clark, Clopton, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davenport, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Geddes, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hawkins, Hubbard, Hulbert, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lefferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McKee, Miller, Moffit, Moseley, Murfree, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Post, John Reed, Rhea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Sage, Schureman, Sevier, Sharp, Sherwood, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Strong, Sturges, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Winter, and Yancey—86

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Bard, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Croighton, Davis of Pennsylvania, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Jackson of Virginia, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Newton, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Udree, and Wilson of Pennsylvania—44

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, the first, second, and third articles contained in the proposition aforesaid, were recommitted to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

MONDAY, October 3.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, JOHN W. TAYLOR; and from Virginia, HUGH NELSON; appeared, and took their seats.

A resolution was offered by Mr. DESHA to instruct the Military Committee to inquire into the expediency of making compensation for horses lost in the service by mounted volunteers and militia; which was overruled by the House, by a small majority, under the impression, it appeared, that the subject was already specially referred to a different committee.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, of Kentucky, in offering the following, assigned as a reason his desire to put officers and privates on the same footing in this respect. The bill which was passed in 1813 on this subject, contained, when sent from this House, a provision applying to soldiers as well as officers, but that clause embracing privates had been stricken out by the Senate. His motion was in the following terms:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the widows and orphans of militia privates slain in the service of the United States.

The motion having been amended, on suggestion of Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, so as to include also those who may die or have died whilst in the service, and also so as to refer the subject to the Military Committee, instead of the Committee of Claims, was agreed to.

HONORARY REWARDS.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported resolutions expressive of the thanks of Congress for the gallantry and good conduct with which the arms of the United States have been sustained by Major General Brown, and Brigadiers Scott, Gaines, and Maccomb, during the present campaign.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, moved to refer the resolves to the Committee of the whole House. There were two names omitted in one resolve, he meant those of General Porter and General Ripley, which had been associated in all the actions named in it; and he did not see why, if such should also be the opinion of the House, they should not be incorporated in the resolution, as their merits in his opinion entitled them to be.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, said it was desirable that these resolutions should be acted on with unanimity; if not, they would be deprived of half their value and consequence—he should not, therefore, object to any course the House might think proper to pursue in relation to them. The report of this morning was intended only as a report in part. In acting on a question so environed with delicacy and difficulty as this, it had been necessary for the committee to prescribe some limitations to itself, and it appeared to them that the House would acknowledge the same necessity. The first limit they had agreed on was to the present campaign—the second, to General Officers in the Army of the United States. In considering this subject, the claims of others than those expressly noticed could not have been passed over by the committee. The names mentioned by the gentleman from Vermont had particularly claimed their attention. The name of Porter was intimately associated in military fame with those already mentioned. Not only had he been distinguished by his gallantry and good conduct in the field, but by his zeal and activity in collecting together a band of patriotic militia in aid of the regular army, at a time when that army most needed the services of such reinforcements. Under these circumstances, it was impossible for the committee to pass by, nay, not to notice with special attention the claim of General Porter; but it was inconsistent with the limitation the committee had prescribed to itself, inasmuch as he was not attached to the regular service, but an officer of the militia. As to General Ripley, it had been thought proper, as he had not been first in command on these occasions, to pass by his case for the present, referring it to a future occasion, on which it was the intention of the committee to embrace other cases of meritorious conduct displayed not only during the present but preceding campaigns.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, said it was far from his intention to object to the testimony proposed to be given by the House to the merits of the officers named in the resolve, but to incorporate in it other characters, entitled, as he thought, to the like tribute. For that purpose, he wished it referred to a Committee of Whole.

The resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of a temporary removal of the Seat of Government from the City of Washington, &c. reported:

"That the committee had had the same under consideration, and directed the Chairman to submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it inexpedient to remove the Seat of Government at this time from the City of Washington.

The House having agreed to consider the report—

Mr. FISK, of New York, said he had reported that resolution in conformity to the directions of a majority of the committee; but he now thought it his duty to move to strike out the word "inexpedient," and insert the word "expedient."

A short desultory conversation took place between several members in relation to the state of defence of the place, &c.

When the question on Mr. FISK's motion to amend (the effect of which was to declare it expedient to remove) was taken and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Dard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Caperton, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey—68.

The House being equally divided—

The SPEAKER said, he was now called on to give a vote as unexpected as painful. He would, on this occasion, as on any other, regardless of the feelings that might be thereby excited, and the impressions probably received, give that vote which he believed the interests, safety, and honor, of the nation under all the circumstances to require. He was deeply impressed with the belief that these considerations required him to vote in the affirmative. The reason for this vote was, that this District could not be defended except at an immense expense, and an expense perhaps half of that which would be necessary to carry on the war.

So the amendment was carried.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, moved to refer the report as amended to the Committee of the whole House, that it might be more fully and freely discussed.

Mr. BURWELL, of Virginia, appeared to favor the reference of this motion to a select committee to report a bill. Although against his own opinion, he admired the firmness and decision with which the Speaker on this, as on every occasion, had acted. He was desirous that this question should be decided as speedily as possible—and, although no person was more sanguine than he was that, before it was finally acted on, the opinion of the House would change on this subject, he was desirous now to see this resolve referred to a select committee with instructions to report a bill in pursuance thereof.

Mr. FISK having acceded to the proposed reference to a Committee of the Whole, the business was so disposed of, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

TUESDAY, October 4.

On motion of Mr. GHOLSON,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the "act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise," so as to allow the proprietors of spirituous liquors distilled from domestic materials, of which they are themselves the growers, to sell, without license, any quantity thereof not less than one gallon.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported unfavorably to the petition of Edwin Lewis; which report was concurred in. The report is as follows:

H. of R.

Bounty on Prisoners—Removal of the Seat of Government.

OCTOBER, 1814.

That the petitioner states, that in the years 1804, 1805, and 1806, a Captain Thomas Swain, of the United States' Army, cut and used for the public service a large quantity of timber belonging to the petitioner; that the petitioner sued him for it, and recovered judgment, and that the said Captain Swain has since died insolvent, without making compensation for the timber. The petition is not supported by any evidence of the facts; the committee are of opinion, however, that, taking the facts as true, the petitioner is not entitled to relief. They, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. YANCEY also made an unfavorable report on the memorial of Thomas Cutts; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That Tristram Hooper, Moses Lowell, and Benjamin Chandler, were indebted to the United States by a judgment recovered against them on a revenue bond; an execution issued against their property, and was levied by the marshal of the district on three eighths parts of the schooner Catharine. At the sale of the schooner, the petitioner, Thomas Cutts, became the purchaser at the price of four hundred and twenty-five dollars. A claim to the three-quarters of the three-eighths of this vessel was afterwards set up by Asa Stevens; and, in action against the petitioner, it appears he recovered for damages, interest, and costs, the sum of $904 35; which sum the petitioner prays to be remunerated, together with the sum of $455, which he alleges had been paid to counsel and witnesses in the suit, and expended by himself in attendance, and for which it is stated his vouchers are lost.

The committee are of opinion the petitioner is not entitled to relief; they view this as a common case of sale, under an execution in which the plaintiff cannot be considered the warrantor of the property. The purchaser buys at his own risk; and it is for him to judge whether the title of the defendant in the execution is good or bad. They, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

BOUNTY ON PRISONERS.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending to merchant recaptors the provisions of the bill allowing a bounty on prisoners to the owners and crews of private armed vessels, reported, that it was inexpedient to extend the provisions of the said act to the case just stated.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, opposed the adoption of this report on various grounds. The risk and importance of the recapture of merchantmen was not, he said, inferior to the risk and importance of captures by private armed vessels. The cause of humanity would be also served by it, as the lives of the enemy's seamen might in some instances be preserved, in consequence of such an inducement, &c. He hoped it would never be said that this House, by a large majority, determined to offer a bounty on deserters from the army of the enemy, and yet refused a small premium on seamen of the enemy thus meritoriously made prisoners. Mr. K. concluded his observations by moving to amend the report by striking out "inexpedient," and inserting "expedient."

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, stated the reasons which had given birth to this report. The principal reason was, that whilst the proposed extension of bounty to such cases would add very little inducement to recapture, it would add very greatly to the hardship and suffering of those of our citizens who might be captured, who would undoubtedly be more rigidly secured, perhaps in irons, in consequence of the passage of the law.

Mr. KING replied. He did not apprehend that such oppression would be exercised as the gentleman supposed, and believed the objection not valid against the proposition to afford this small reward to our brave seamen for their adventurous valor. He considered this vote as the test whether the friendship expressed on all hands for our brave tars was substantial or mere profession.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, explained his ideas of the policy of the act now proposed to be amended, which he did not look upon in the light of a bounty to privateers, but as an inducement to them to bring in prisoners when captured instead of releasing them. The proposed amendment he did not consider as at all essential to, or connected with the policy of that act—and the inducements to recapture he considered to be quite sufficient already without it.

The motion of Mr. KING was negatived, and the report accepted by a large majority.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House, on motion of Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, having taken up this subject, and being about to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole thereon—

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, observed that he believed much debate was not necessary, as gentlemen had not only deliberated but already made up their minds. He wished to come at the question, and with many others had rather render his vote on this subject than hear any discussion whatever; and, therefore, moved an indefinite postponement of the question.

This motion was opposed by Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, both of whom placed their opposition on the ground of a desire for further information—the one, however, declaring his present opinion in favor of, and the other against, removal.

The question was then taken on indefinite postponement, and decided in the negative, many of those opposed to removal, having, with Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, voted against indefinite postponement of the motion. For the postponement 61, against it 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Burwell, Chappell, Clopton, Culpeper, Dana, Earle, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irving, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy,

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report abovementioned.

Mr. PEARSON, of North Carolina, rose to speak against the resolution, and continued to speak with great ability and force of reasoning, as well on the question of expediency as on that of Constitutionality, until about three o'clock; when the Committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, October 5.

Another member, to wit: from Rhode Island ELISHA R. POTTER, appeared, and took his seat.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee on the expediency of a temporary removal of the Seat of Government. The resolution under consideration stands as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient at this time to remove the Seat of Government from the City of Washington.

Mr. STOCKTON, of New Jersey, said, he had at one time determined to take no part in the discussion now before the Committee, but to remain satisfied with a silent vote. The subject had always appeared to him of such a nature, as to preclude any just expectation of good resulting from much debate. We should make no proselytes on one side or the other—the subject lies level with every man's understanding. Gentlemen need only to open the Constitution of their country—cast their eyes around—survey the District, and observe what was before them, to enable them to judge correctly. He had, however, been induced to alter this resolution by the course of argument which an honorable member from North Carolina (Mr. PEARSON, who he was sorry not to see in his seat) had thought proper to pursue. That gentleman had made many remarks which were susceptible of a satisfactory answer; many which Mr. S. thought ought not to go forth without an answer;—they might, if unanswered, be thought correct, and would, he feared, delude and mislead those whom that gentlemen had with so much zeal and ability attempted to serve. No gentleman, Mr. S. said, could feel less personal interest in the question than he did; coming from a State having very humble pretensions to consequence or patronage—never himself expecting to be here again after this session—he could view the subject with coolness and impartiality. The honorable member he alluded to had indulged himself in very extensive and wide excursions. Mr. S. would not attempt to follow him in his whole course, but content himself with selecting some of his leading points, leaving it to other gentlemen to remark on the residue if they saw fit. To get at the gentleman's argument at once, he would consider it under two general heads—

1st. The legal, Constitutional right of Congress to remove the Seat of Government.

2d. The propriety or expediency of exercising that right if they had it.

The gentleman from North Carolina had denied both; he would contend for the affirmative of each proposition.

1st. Does the Government of the United States possess the legal Constitutional power of removing itself from this District? Mr. S. said, it was obvious that this point must be subdivided into two: 1st. Has the Government the power of temporary removal? 2d. Has it the power of permanent removal? Mr. S. said, that he considered the first as the only question now properly before the Committee. It was true, that the proposition contained in the resolution was general in its terms, yet it seemed to be agreed on all sides, that only a temporary removal was contemplated at present. We were not ready now to act on so extensive a subject—one involving so many considerations of public interest, of private feeling and justice, as that of a permanent removal. This great point, then, was really not before the committee. But the gentleman from North Carolina supposing, probably, that upon the question of permanent removal he was impregnable, had pressed it into his service; its discussion was, therefore, proper, and might be useful. As to the legal Constitutional right of the Government to remove itself for a season on good and sufficient reasons, who, Mr. S. asked, could seriously doubt it? What section of the Constitution, what principle of reason, common sense, or common justice, could be relied on to take from the national councils so common and necessary an attribute of sovereignty? None could be produced; the gentleman could find none; no gentleman had hazarded the assertion. The honorable gentleman himself from North Carolina, with all his zeal, industry, and talent, had not brought his mind up to such an assertion in direct terms; yet it was necessary to a successful opposition to this resolution, not only to make, but to make good this extravagant position. Why, he asked, should the people have thus fettered, thus imprisoned, their Government? Why should an act, ascertaining the place where the Government should sit, be considered so sacred as not to be approached by the Government which enacted it? Why, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, should it be irrevocable? If pestilence came—if famine or war came—were we to be enchained to the spot, by the magic force of an act not to be altered? The proposition was monstrous; he had no hesitation in pronouncing that such an idea was totally destitute of foundation, either in Constitutional law, common sense, or common justice. Congress, Mr. S. said, had settled this question by passing a law, not only asserting the right of temporary removal for sufficient reasons, but delegating that right to the President of the United States. He alluded to the act of 1794, by which the President is authorized, by proclamation, to convene Congress at some other place than that fixed by law, if, in his opinion, by reason of a contagious disease, or any other cause, Congress could not meet at the Seat of Government without danger to the lives and healths of the members. If this matter had been exposed to any doubt, this law would have settled it; it is a legislative authority upon the very point; and so far are the people of the United States from entertaining the scruples the honorable gentleman had imputed to them, that there was a very common expectation in that part of the Union Mr. S. was conversant with, that after the late inroad of the enemy, and the destruction of the public buildings here, the President would by proclamation have convened Congress at some other place. He might have so done with strict propriety; the fact which was before him, the catastrophe which had happened, would have justified the conclusion that we could not sit here with safety to the lives and healths of the members; the general terms of the act alluded to seemed designed to meet such a case as had happened, and although the President did not think proper to execute the authority, yet the investing him with it was decisive of the right to remove for sufficient reasons. But, Mr. S. said, he would go further, submit with confidence to the Committee that the two Houses of Congress, without the assent of the President, might by a joint resolution remove themselves for this session, and this would of course produce a removal of the Government, and all its departments. Mr. S. relied on the fifth section of the Constitution to prove his position. It is there provided, "that neither House shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting." This provision not only prohibits unseasonable adjournments and separations, but expressly admits and regulates the general power of removal; and, (if a grant of power was in such a case necessary, though he thought it was not,) by necessary implication, it invests in the two Houses a right by joint vote to adjourn to any other place; and yet this is the very power of temporary removal which seems now to be called in question. Mr. S. said that he felt that he had troubled the Committee already too long upon this part of the subject; he should, therefore, leave the question of the right of temporary removal, under the persuasion that no member of the Committee entertained a doubt about it.

The honorable gentleman from North Carolina had expressly denied the Constitutional right of Congress to pass an act for the permanent removal of the Government—and he had warned the committee, and particularly his political friends, not to break the Constitution of their country nor to disregard the sanctity of contracts by adopting a measure which however disguised under the mask of a temporary removal had for its real object a final change of the Seat of Government. Mr. S. said that it would be a sufficient answer to this course of reasoning to say that the question of final removal was not now before us. All that we were now prepared to act on—all that we should determine by negating the proposed amendment would be, that it was expedient to remove for this session or during the war to a place of more safety and convenience than this District afforded in its present circumstances. We might hereafter take up and determine the other great point—or we might leave it to our successors, who, coming from the people after this discussion, would be the better able to express the public sentiment. But, Mr. S. said, he thought it best to follow the gentleman over this ground. It was due to ourselves to examine the pretensions set up that we might be freed from the imputations thrown out—it was due to the citizens of the District to dissipate the delusion under which they appeared to be, and which the gentleman's very able argument would tend to confirm if it remained unanswered. That argument might be thus concentrated. A permanent Seat of Government, says the gentleman, is required by the Constitution of the United States. By that instrument a power is given to Congress to fix upon a permanent seat. Congress have appointed the place where this permanent seat shall be. The power is executed—the seat is finally located, and cannot be altered by law. This is the marrow of the gentleman's reasoning—but unfortunately it is entirely destitute of foundation from first to last. The gentleman sat out wrong and ended wrong—his premises have no existence, and consequently the conclusion he drew must be unsound. A permanent Seat of Government is not required by the Constitution; the Constitution vests no express power in Congress to appoint a permanent Seat of Government; and Congress, by passing an act fixing the Seat of Government at this place, have executed no such special authority as the gentleman contemplates. The Constitution of the United States, Mr. S. said, was penned with great precision; the great men whose work it was, did not leave express grants of power to be deduced from obscure sentences by a course of subtle reasoning; if it had been their intention to guard a Seat of Government by the ramparts of the Constitution, to place it beyond the reach of the legislative arm; if they had meant to impart to it the great principle of irremovability, it would have been done by the use of clear, unambiguous expressions; it would not have been left to be extracted from the section on which the gentleman relied; some such provision as this would have been introduced—Congress shall have power by law to appoint a place for the permanent Seat of the Government of the United States, which shall not be changed, nor shall the law fixing the same be liable to be repealed by a future Congress. This or some article of similar import would have been ingrafted in the Constitution, if the Convention had intended to do what the gentlemen says they have done; but there is no such provision; the only article having any relation to the Seat of Government, the only Constitutional provision which the gentleman could press into his service, is that part of the 8th section which ordains that "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, dock yards, and other needful buildings." This is the section upon which the gentleman relies—and Mr. S. said he would leave it to his candor whether it was not perfectly manifest, on the bare reading of it, that it was not intended to impart any principle of irremovability to the Seat of Government, but simply and singly to secure to Congress the right of governing each and every place where the Seat of Government might be, and where the public money might be expended in works of defence—to his mind it was perfectly clear that this was the sound interpretation of the section. Mr. S. said, that the power of exclusive legislation over the Seat of Government was important and necessary to the dignity and even to the safety of the National Legislature. It could be derived from no other source than that of express grant from the people; it is granted in clear and precise terms. In addition to the evident sense and meaning of the language made use of—the other places besides the Seat of Government, over which the same section extends the legislative power of Congress must convince every one open to conviction, that the object was not to secure the permanency of the Seat of Government at one place, but merely the right of governing the people at any place; for the same provision in the same terms is applied to forts, magazines, arsenals, and dock yards; hence it would follow, if the honorable gentleman was right, that a fort, a magazine, an arsenal, or a dock yard once established could never be removed to a better site, or be abandoned without a breach of the Constitution and of the public faith. The article then upon which the gentleman relies, has no bearing on the question; it was designed to perform another office; to effect another purpose, which it has fully and effectually done. But, Mr. S. admitted that Congress have unquestionably the right to fix the Seat of Government—it might then be demanded of him how it possessed that power if not by Constitutional grant. The answer, he said, was plain, the right was not derived from express grant, but was necessarily annexed to the Government immediately on its creation, by force of general principles inherent and essential to the legislative power. From these principles it inevitably resulted that every legislative power possessed a right to locate itself, to prescribe and regulate its times and places of sitting at its will and pleasure, unless restrained by the Constitutional instrument—hence it was not necessary to confer such powers by express grant. Therefore it is that there is no express grant, and it will appear upon examination that these powers are never referred to in the Constitution, but for the purpose of limiting the general power. The right then is inherent; it must be possessed by every legislative body; not by a grant of express power to determine times and places of sitting, but by the general grant of legislative power; such a power must be subservient to and be regulated by the legislative will, to be expressed in the ordinary way, by vote or statute. This vote or statute being nothing but the exercise of a common legislative sanction, was subject to be modified, altered, or repealed, at the pleasure of the Legislature. The case, then, said Mr. S. stands thus: the Constitution does not fix the Seat of Government. It does not even direct Congress to fix it—it merely secures the jurisdiction of Congress over it. It leaves the Legislature, in virtue of inherent powers, to determine the place. It has done so by common legislative act or statute. This act may be repealed or altered, because it is not the act of the people sitting in convention, but of the Legislature—a statute has appointed the place—a statute may change it. The Seat of Government has no Constitutional guard to keep it stationary; it must rely on the wisdom and justice of the legislative will. And, Mr. S. added, that this was the only true and safe ground upon which it could have been left. The Convention had acted wisely in leaving it where it was. The people never would have consented to any other arrangement, and those concerned had sufficient security that their rights would be properly respected. Mr. S. said he would submit it to the liberality of gentlemen to say whether a country circumstanced as this was when the Constitution was formed, paying a just regard to its rights and prosperity, could have delegated to Congress such a power as is contended for by the honorable member from North Carolina. A power to fix the Seat of Government—for centuries—forever. Who can believe that the people of the United States would have vested such a power in the Congress of 1789? Our country was then just emerging from the dangers and difficulties attending the war of the Revolution—our resources were not ascertained—our strength had scarcely begun to develop itself. The imbecility of the old Confederation had reduced us to a state of almost convulsive despair. A great crisis had arrived—it produced the Constitution. What candid man can believe that such a power, at such a time, would have been vested in any Congress? A power to fix a permanent Seat of Government, without regard to the alterations, improvements, revolutions, and changes which would naturally be produced by a good Government, an increasing population, and the settlement of the vast regions of the Western country. To establish a Seat of Government independent of the National Legislature, where by force of law it must remain, in spite of the most weighty reasons of public interest and convenience. No, sir, said Mr. S., the enlightened people of the United States would have conferred no such powers on a single Congress—if such a provision had been presented to them they would have rejected it. They left this important concern where it might safely be deposited, not in the Congress—but in every Congress. The citizens interested in a particular spot had all reasonable security that their rights would be properly respected. It could never be presumed that the Legislature would remove without solid reasons. The loss of dignity—the trouble and expense incurred by a Government often “on wheels”—the money expended in public buildings and improvements—the influence of those residing at the Seat of Government, were all so many securities against hasty or injurious removals. Nor could he believe that a bill would ever pass all the branches of the Legislature to sanction a change unless it was bottomed on strong and palpable reasons. Mr. S. said that the train of argument which he had pursued furnished a conclusive answer to all the cases put by the gentleman from North Carolina, particularly to the case of the repeal of the statute establishing the Circuit Courts of the United States. The rights of the judges were Constitutional, they were founded on the express grants of that instrument, which ordained that they should hold their offices during good behaviour, and that their salaries should not be diminished; the objection to the repealing act was, that it was a mean of depriving them at once of both office and salary, which could not be legally done either openly or covertly. In the case before us he had shown that there was no such Constitutional grant, and therefore there could exist no Constitutional obstacle.

Mr. S. said that the honorable gentleman from North Carolina had relied much upon the word permanent, which he had found in the acts of Congress and of cession, and had from it contended, that it was the manifest sense of Congress and of the States of Maryland and Virginia, that the District being ceded and accepted, must always remain the Seat of Government. He observed that not much reliance was to be placed upon an argument derived from a syllable or a word in a statute, unless its meaning harmonized with the context and the manifest intent of the makers; that the word permanent was not to be found in the Constitution. That instrument only spoke of the Seat of Government, and therefore if it had been introduced into the laws with design to alter, enlarge, or restrain the Constitutional provision, it would be inoperative and useless. A statute could not run counter to the Constitution—it could neither restrain nor enlarge its provisions; if the expression was introduced with any such intent it was vain and nugatory. But Mr. S. was satisfied that this was not the case; and that the word permanent was introduced for another and very different purpose. It would be recollected by every member that the same act which fixed the Seat of Government here after the lapse of ten years, established it at Philadelphia during that period; hence Philadelphia was the temporary, this the permanent Seat of the Government. The word permanent was evidently made use of to distinguish the proposed residence here from the temporary abode in Philadelphia. Indeed, the word itself when applied to statutory provisions meant nothing more than that there was no limitation of time annexed. As to the acts of cession, in his opinion they had no bearing on the question. The cession is required by the Constitution, and could only be made or received for the purposes contemplated by the Constitution. These were to enable Congress to exercise jurisdiction over the District as long as it remained the Seat of Government; and if they went further (which was not the case) they were so far void and nugatory. They could impart no principle of irremovability not found in the Constitution itself. Nor did the makers of these statutes intend that they should. The operation of the acts of cession was merely to surrender the jurisdiction to Congress while the Seat of Government remained. The removal of Congress would not injure the political rights or liberties of the inhabitants. While the law remained unrepealed, they would be governed by Congress; a final removal would put an end to the whole fabric, and they would revert to their ancient allegiance, which the two States would not fail to claim. For these reasons Mr. S. thought that there existed no Constitutional impediment to a removal, much less was there any breach of contract or public faith in leaving the place, if the public interest required it. Congress possessed no power to contract, and never had contracted, that the Seat of Government should remain here. It is true, said he, that they fixed it here with a bona fide intent that it should remain here, believing then, that under existing circumstances, it was the most fit and convenient place; but Congress did never attempt to, nor could they, deprive their successors of the inherent right of removal when the public good should require it. Mr. S. said that he hoped he had established the right of Congress to remove the Seat of Government, either for a season or finally. For one he would never give up his right, nor bear it denied without entering his protest against it; but although he claimed the right of Congress to legislate on the subject, yet he acknowledged that it was a subject of great importance as it regarded the public and the citizens concerned. It behooved Congress, for its own dignity, not to be capricious as to the place of its location, and to take care not wantonly to sport with the feelings and interests of the inhabitants. He would never consent to exercise the right on light or trivial grounds. When he did exercise it, he would endeavor to do it with a sacred regard to the principles of justice, so that no man should be the loser by it. He would make compensation where compensation was due. As to the subject of compensation, Mr. S. said that he thought it not now before the Committee; yet he would say that he thought it ought to be made to many of the citizens in case of a final removal, but not to all. He would go on the principle of preventing actual loss, not that of securing gain. The great landholder who had converted barren land into city lots, and made a fortune out of his sales, was not to be compensated because he was prevented from making more. The speculator, too, must abide by his loss. The Government minion was not to be paid for being torn from his hold; it was a more humble and more meritorious class of citizens to whom he would extend compensation; to the men of moderate means; to the poor of the District, (if he might call them so without offence,) worthy men, who had laid out their all in procuring establishments which would be worth little if a removal took place. These men he would compensate, and he would do it on a large and liberal scale. Mr. S. said he would trouble the Committee no longer on this point. He trusted that he had made good his promise; that he had established the power of the Government to remove, to the entire conviction of the Committee. He should not revert to it again, but leave what he had said to take care of itself. But the propriety of exercising the right of removal still remained to be considered. Is it now expedient to remove the Seat of Government for a season to some other place? In this question, Mr. S. said every citizen of the United States had an interest. It was a great public question, and ought to be decided on principles exclusively public, on a cool and dispassionate consideration of the public good. If the public good, if the interests of this great and growing nation require a removal under existing circumstances, we ought to go, although the people of this District might be injured. If the public good forbids it, we ought to remain here, without any regard to personal inconvenience. He had made up his mind with reluctance; but, upon a view of the whole subject, he thought a temporary removal at least was essential to the honor and interest of the nation. He had come to this conclusion on the grounds that we could not be accommodated here in such a manner as was essential to the public service, and that the Government would not be in safety here during the war, without incurring an enormous expense, which the Treasury was unable to pay, and to which it ought not to be exposed. As to accommodations, Mr. S. said he did not mourn over our losses on account of "soft seats," or "splendid furniture"—no chair was too hard, no furniture too plain for him—but are the accommodations reasonable? Such as would secure the health of the members, and enable them to do the public business with propriety and to advantage? He thought that they were not. In regard to ourselves, said Mr. S., here we are in the Patent Office; in a room not large enough to furnish a seat for each member, when all are present, although every spot, up to the fire-places and windows, is occupied. When Winter comes and fires must be lighted, or if we should have a Summer session, (which appears inevitable, if the war continues,) he did not believe that the health of the members could be preserved in that room. Some better place of sitting must be provided. Here, then, was no other resource but in repairing the public buildings—were gentlemen prepared for this? Would they follow up a vote to remain here with large appropriations for this purpose, exposed as we should be during this wretched war to other attacks? He believed not; no gentleman was prepared to do this now; every cent which we could raise would be necessary for more important concerns; concerns of vital importance, of indispensable necessity, to prop the drooping credit of the nation; to pay the soldier and sailor who are fighting our battles. Are we then to remain here in our present condition until that peace which we have wantonly thrown away shall return? Are we thus to expose ourselves because the good people of this District do not choose to part with us? He hoped not. If we removed to Philadelphia, we were offered accommodations without incurring any expense, and might remain there until this place, or any other, which the wisdom of Congress might select, was prepared for our reception.

Mr. S. said that he would dwell no longer upon this point; he was willing to acknowledge that it was the other consideration he had alluded to which most influenced him; it was the enormous expense which would be incurred in defending the Government at this place. He was very doubtful whether we could be defended at all by the description of force we could command—a militia force, to be collected principally from the neighboring States of Maryland and Virginia. He had little reliance on the efficacy of such a defence; it had once been tried, and failed, so completely and radically as to involve the nation in disgrace. The force, upon this occasion, was of as good a character as any that could be procured now, and, being under the same direction, he could see no security against the repetition of the same disgraceful scene. This District, he said, was most assailable; it might be approached by water at different points within a few hours' march. A small addition of force, a small variation of plan, would enable an enterprising and disciplined foe to repeat his triumph. The presence of Congress here would be the only inducement for the enemy again to attack the place, and he thought it a very strong inducement. It was evident that the war on the coast was, on the part of the enemy, merely predatory, intended not so much to attain objects important in a military point of view as to harass the Government, and expose it to much trouble, and expense, and mortification. The dispersion or capture of the members of Congress, now assembled, would gratify the pride and resentment of the English nation more than any other operation their army on the coast could perform. He thought that there was a great probability that the enemy would make the attempt; they were yet in the neighborhood, evidently waiting the arrival of reinforcements. To his mind, there could be presented no more unfit or disgraceful a situation to which the enemy could expose us, than to oblige the National Legislature, whose deliberations should be removed from the din of arms, to be witnesses of a battle fought in their neighborhood, upon which their safety depended. If unsuccessful, (and we had no great reason to expect success,) the members might be made prisoners, or owe their safety to flight; their papers lost, themselves held up as objects of scorn to the foe, and of contempt to their own people. But if he should admit that the Government could be defended here, yet the expense would be enormous. Some days ago, the honorable chairman of the Military Committee had informed us that it was the intention of the War Department to keep up a disposable force of twenty-one thousand militia for the defence of the District; and, since, it had been intimated from the same quarter that it was to be increased to thirty thousand. Including pay of officers, waste, the wear and tear of such an expensive description of troops, the expense of each man would not be less than one dollar and fifty cents per day. Twenty thousand men would cost thirty thousand dollars a day, or ten millions nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year. Thirty thousand men would require forty-five thousand dollars a day, or sixteen millions four hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars a year. He considered this calculation as moderate, and he asked if such an expense could be endured; he thought it ought not to be endured; no, not for a month, a week, or a day. The country could not sustain it; the people would never submit to it; they could not, and would not, defend this District at such a cost. It had been asserted that the same force would be required, and the same expense incurred, if the Government removed; for that this place and Baltimore must be defended. Mr. S. observed, that the destruction of the public buildings, of the navy yard, and the public property here, had taken away every inducement to attack the place, except dispersing the Government. It seemed therefore to follow, that, if the Government removed, little or no force need be kept on foot here. And, with respect to Baltimore, no one could believe that the United States meant to provide twenty or thirty thousand men and keep them in service to defend that city. The Baltimore troops were numerous and respectable, and would require little aid, except when particularly threatened, and the necessary aid would soon be received from the adjoining country and States; that is to say, as many militia as would answer any valuable purpose. He had no opinion of keeping large bodies of militia in camp, they become homesick, and on a retreat would never stop until they got home. It was true that the people of the District were entitled to protection; but they must be contented with the same kind of defence as was afforded to their fellow-citizens elsewhere. But he would ask, what other spot of the same dimensions and population had such a defence as was calculated upon here? He was satisfied, for himself, that this great force, this heavy expense, would not be required if the Government should remove. It would, in a great measure, be saved to the Treasury and the people. The times, he said, called for rigid economy in every department. The people would soon be taxed for almost everything which they wore or ate; almost for the air they breathe. It could not be expected that they would, under present circumstances, be willing to see their money thus squandered only to gratify the false pride of making laws among ruins. For his part, he thought it unjust, and would never assent to it. Mr. S. said that, before he sat down, he would declare that he had no covert intention; that he meant to go no further than he had expressed. He had formed and would deliver no opinion as to the permanent removal; that was a great national question; it might be safely confided to the wisdom and justice of a future Congress. The people of this District, he thought, had great claims and great advantages; the inducements to return here would be strong; nothing but a conviction that, upon great principles, the good of the nation required a removal, could prevent the return of the Government. There exists a statute, having no limitation, fixing the Seat of Government here: this must be repealed, or the Government must return. There is in the District a real estate belonging to the United States of considerable value. The inhabitants have many claims upon the justice of the Government which will not be overlooked. They have also the zealous support of a great interest from the Southern States. The probability is, that a majority will never agree upon any other place. He therefore thought that they had magnified the danger they were in. If the removal was temporary the evil would be temporary, and must be set down to the account of this war. If it was final, compensation would be made in all cases in which it was due. On the whole, he should vote against the amendment proposed by the honorable member from North Carolina.

Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. FISK, of New York, spoke in favor of removal, and Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, and Mr. FISK, of Vermont, and Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, against it.

Mr. PEARSON, of North Carolina, had yesterday made a motion to amend the above resolve by striking out the word "expedient" and inserting in lieu thereof, the word "inexpedient."

The question on this motion was decided in the negative by the following vote: For the amendment 67, and against it 70.

The Committee then rose, and reported progress.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring it expedient at this time to remove from the City of Washington.

Mr. PEARSON addressed the House as follows—

Mr. Speaker: I very much fear the House will be ill requited for their indulgence in acceding to an adjournment yesterday at my instance. This apprehension is heightened by the circumstance, that it has fallen to my lot to enter the lists with an adversary so powerful, so justly distinguished, as the honorable gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. STOCKTON.) The odds are, indeed, awful. My reliance is in the justice of my cause, and the candid and liberal judgments of those who hear me. I must, however, be permitted to say, that the argument of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, (whom I have so often heard with conviction and delight when engaged in a better cause,) has tended to confirm rather than disturb the opinions I entertain on the question submitted for our decision.

The insulated proposition before us is, whether it be expedient or inexpedient for Congress to remove the Seat of the General Government from its present abode to some other place for a limited time. The specious garb which envelopes this proposition hides from the superficial eye much of its real deformity. It is our right and our duty to strip it and analyze it with that accuracy due to its importance—with that care which is demanded by a sacred regard for the national faith, the national interest, and above all the preservation of the union of these States.

Perhaps few articles in our Constitution have marked more fully the wisdom and foresight of those illustrious men who framed that charter of liberty, than the provision in the 8th section of the 1st article, which says, "Congress shall exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States," &c.

The policy of this power in Congress is as manifest as the freedom and independence of its sessions, its members and deliberations are essential. That this sentiment may not rest on my authority alone, I beg leave to enforce it by an authority which will not be disregarded by gentlemen on this side of the House, with whom in general I have the satisfaction to think and to act, but many of whom I regret to find on this occasion embodied against me. The authority alluded to, is that excellent exposition of the Constitution entitled The Federalist. This authority will not be objected to by the other side of the House, when they are informed that the extract I am about to read is the production of the present Chief Magistrate.

In considering the section of the Constitution to which I have referred, this author says: "The indispensable necessity of complete authority at the Seat of Government, carries its own evidence with it. It is a power exercised by every Legislature in the Union, I might say of the world, ' by virtue of its general supremacy. Without it, not only the public authority might be insulted, and its proceedings be interrupted with impunity, but a dependence of the members of the General Government on the State comprehending the Seat of the Government for protection in the exercise of its duty, might bring on the National Councils an imputation of awe or influence, equally dishonorable to the Government and dissatisfactory to the other members of the Confederacy."

For those reasons, and many other considerations which will suggest themselves to every reflecting man, Congress were vested with the power, and it became their duty, to establish the Seat of the General Government in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. This power has been exercised, this duty has been performed. The subject demanded and received the attention due to its importance by the first Congress which assembled after the adoption of the Constitution. Many of the members of the first Congress had also been members of the Convention, and may well be presumed to have best understood the powers given and duties enjoined by that sacred instrument which they had contributed to form. It would be little less than impious to accuse them of violating their own act; it would be the extreme of presumption to charge them with ignorance as to the limitation of powers which they themselves had prescribed.

By reference to the Congressional Register of 1789, it will be found that the first Congress had scarcely assembled before their attention was peculiarly directed to the important subject of locating the permanent Seat of the General Government in the mode pointed out by the Constitution. Those friends of union well knew the necessity of this power, and its inevitable tendency to bind faster and faster the members of this political association, some of whom were but feebly knit together, and the cement of the whole yet soft and infirm. Every effort was therefore essential to give a heart to this body, from which its several members would derive support, strength, and confidence. This great object was to be effected by embracing the earliest opportunity to establish the permanent Seat of the General Government on principles of justice and equality; having a due regard to the extent, population, and convenience of all the States; regarding, at the same time, the progressive increase of our Western settlements, the Atlantic navigation, and a convenient intercourse with the Western country. Upon these principles, it was resolved by the first Congress to fix the permanent residence of the Government.

It will be recollected by the House that, in the course of my remarks the other day, I referred to the speeches of almost every distinguished member of the first Congress in relation to this subject, from which it appeared that not one individual member questioned the Constitutional right of Congress to establish permanently the Seat of the Government. On the contrary, every member knew and admitted they were then legislating on a question not so important to themselves at that moment, but which was deemed vitally important to the perpetuity of the Union, as it would be binding for ages yet to come. With this understanding, and for this object, we find the word permanent emphatically used in every resolution, in every act, in every speech, syllable, or letter on this subject. It is true, in the discussion on this subject, local jealousies, local feelings and influence were not totally discarded. They were manifested as to the place which should become the centre of the Union, but entered not into the question of the perpetuity of the act about to be performed. The essence of the act was its perpetuity, its binding force on future legislatures, to put forever at rest a question, the agitation of which might in after times awaken and give new vigor to passions and jealousies, which the adoption of the Constitution had hushed, and which it was the first duty of wise legislators to keep in profound sleep; because, if again aroused, they might shake the Union to its centre.

The principles on which the permanent Seat of the General Government should be established being recognised and admitted by all, the contest solely rested between the rival pretensions of the banks of the Susquehanna and those of the Potomac. The superior claims of the Potomac ultimately prevailed, and Congress did, on the 15th of July, 1790, and by an amendatory act of March 3d, 1791, designate and accept the present District of Columbia for "the permanent Seat of the Government of the United States." By the same and subsequent acts, the President was authorized to enter into engagements for the acceptance of such quantity of land on the east side of the Potomac, within the said District, as he might deem proper for the use of the United States. He was authorized to erect public buildings, and, through the agency of commissioners, to lay off and designate the plan of this city, which bears its name. For this purpose, he was vested with power to enter into contracts and stipulations with the proprietors of lands within the limits of the city for an absolute transfer of their lands in fee simple, for the objects contemplated, and in consideration of the act of Congress establishing the permanent Seat of the Government of the United States. By virtue of the powers vested in the President, and in consideration of the objects specified in the several acts of Congress alluded to, the proprietors did cede to the United States at least three-fourths of all the lands within the limits of this city, and for which no compensation was received, except for a few acres on which public buildings were erected, and some squares exclusively designed for public purposes. In furtherance of these objects, a great variety of other powers were granted to the President, the execution of which necessarily involved the interests of numerous individuals, and for the successful completion of which public faith could and did alone constitute the guarantee. Under these powers, and for the objects contemplated, large donations were received, lots were sold, loans were obtained, and pledges given, for their repayment, of the very property which had been surrendered by individuals to the United States.

The donations from the States of Maryland and Virginia, together with the sale of lots, which cost the Government nothing, amount to more than eight hundred thousand dollars. The public ground remaining unsold, is estimated at nearly one million of dollars. It may be worthy of remark, that soon after the establishment of this District as the permanent seat of the Government, foreigners were authorized to purchase and hold lands within its limits. The then President of the United States, General Washington, availed himself of this circumstance, not only to raise funds, but also to interest respectable foreigners and skilful artisans of all countries in aid of this new but extensive establishment. With this view agents were sent to Europe with official certified copies of all the laws and proceedings in relation to this subject, on the authority of which artists were induced to come from various parts of Europe and settle here. Large sales of city lots were made in different countries of Europe, particularly Holland and England, which property to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars is still held by those purchasers or those claiming under them.

Two other material parties to the compact for fixing the permanent Seat of the Government yet remain to be heard. These are the States of Virginia and Maryland. We need barely refer to the laws of those States to learn the motives and considerations which induced them to surrender their jurisdiction not only of soil but persons, to the extent of ten miles square in the most important section of their States. I will call the attention of the House for a moment to a few of the provisions of an act of Maryland, passed 19th December, 1791, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Columbia and City of Washington." The preamble commences in these emphatic terms: "Whereas the President of the United States, by virtue of several acts of Congress, and acts of the Assemblies of Virginia and Maryland, by his proclamation, dated at Georgetown, on the 30th day of March, 1791, did declare and make known, that the whole of the territory of ten miles square, for the permanent Seat of Government of the United States, shall be located," &c. "And, whereas Notley Young, Daniel Carroll of Duddington, and many others, proprietors of the greater part of the land hereinafter mentioned, have been laid out in a city, came into an agreement, and have conveyed their lands in trust to Thomas Beall, son of George, and John Mackall Gantt, whereby they have subjected their lands to be laid out as a city, given up part to the United States, and subjected other parts to be sold to raise money as a donation to be employed according to the act of Congress for establishing the temporary and permanent Seat of the Government of the United States, under and upon the terms and conditions contained in each of said deeds," &c.

By the second section of said law, it is enacted,

OCTOBER, 1814.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

H. OF R

"That all that part of the said Territory called Columbia, which lies within the limits of this State, shall be, and the same is hereby acknowledged to be, forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and Government of the United States, in full and absolute right and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States," &c. This law then proceeds to subject other lands within the limits of the city to the same terms and conditions as those which had been transferred as before recited, and concludes by making a donation of $72,000, to be applied to the erection of public buildings or other improvements in the City of Washington for the use of the United States. As this subject was until very lately little understood by myself, and possibly less so by many members of the House, I have deemed it necessary to a correct decision, and a proper application of facts to principles, to give a general history of the establishment of the Seat of Government at this place, that we and the nation should know and reflect on the numerous obligations by which the Seat of Government is bound to its present spot—obligations resting not on fluctuating notions of policy, but flowing from the Constitution, sanctioned by repeated laws, rivetted by compacts with States and individuals, and rendered sacred by the pledged faith of the nation.

I will now endeavor, Mr. Speaker, to pursue more directly the arguments of the gentleman from New Jersey through all their divisions and subdivisions, and also notice some remarks which have fallen from the gentlemen from New York, (Messrs. GROSVENOR and FISK.) The gentleman from New Jersey contends: 1st. That Congress have the right to remove the Seat of Government for a limited time, on good and sufficient reasons. This is a position so broad and indefinite as not to admit of a distinct reply. That circumstances and exigencies may happen which would render the exercise of such a power not only proper but necessary, never was and never can be questioned. The very terms of the gentleman's position, "on good and sufficient reasons," do impliedly, if not expressly, admit, that this right does not exist and cannot be exercised as an ordinary discretionary legislative power. The cases put by the honorable gentleman of pestilence, famine, and invasion, are cases of necessity, where nothing is left to legislative will, where no human laws can control; the argument, then, like all arguments drawn from necessity, proves too much, and therefore proves nothing at all.

The act of 1794, which the gentleman has brought to his aid, and on which he placed great reliance, is precisely of the character of the other instances adduced, and must fall into the same result. By that act the President was authorized to convene Congress at a different place from that to which it was adjourned, in the event of the prevalence of contagious sickness or other circumstances which, in his opinion, would be hazardous to the lives or health of the members. This act was proper because it was necessary to the existence of Congress itself; it grew out of the circumstance of the yellow fever, which prevailed in Philadelphia about that time, and cannot be considered as an ordinary exercise of power in Congress to change the seat of Government ad libitum. To argue from the case which the gentleman has put, that the Seat of Government may be changed whenever Congress may think proper, is, in my judgment, as absurd as it would be for me to contend that the Seat of Government must continue here, although the whole District were swallowed up by an earthquake. As to a temporary removal, my argument is simply this, that Congress has not the right to remove the Seat of Government for a limited time, unless for imperious causes, which, if they continue to exist, would justify and render inevitable a permanent removal. Such cases do not exist; they are not pretended to exist. The gentleman, as if indeed hard pressed for argument, has resorted to the fifth section of the Constitution to prove what never was disputed—what may be termed an every day practice—That the two Houses of Congress may by joint resolution adjourn for more than three days—may adjourn their sessions without the concurrence of the Executive, and that neither House shall without the consent of the other change the place of its sitting. The only power given to Congress by this section is, that of regulating its own adjournment independent of the Executive branch of the Government; the other part of the section is a necessary restriction on each House separately, to produce harmony in their proceedings, despatch of business, and to prevent unreasonable adjournments and inconvenient separations, or in other words, to prevent the two Houses from being too far apart for the necessary concurrence of legislation and despatch of public business. I appeal with confidence to the candor of the gentleman himself. I appeal to the common sense of every member of the House, whether it can for a moment be believed, that this section of the Constitution gives to Congress the power, (without even the form of a law,) to remove the Seat of the Government of the United States? Will it be contended (admitting for a moment that we have the right ourselves to remove) that we can, without a law, compel the President and all the Departments to march off to Philadelphia or to the Alleghany mountains at the word of command, or that they would, without the authority of law, exercise at their new locations one single function of their departments? But, says the gentleman, if we go, the President and Departments will follow, and thus we remove the Government. Thus by a sort of legislative legerdemain we put the Government on wheels and push off at full gallop. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, I am shocked at such an argument from such a source. I had believed that the fair and lofty mind of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey could not have descended so low. I had been taught to believe that the pure principles of Federalism disdained to do an act indirectly which could not be done directly without a violation of the Constitution. "If you cannot take the man from the office, so neither can you take the office from the man." This I have always understood to be the creed of Federalism. If the gentleman has abjured the faith in this instance, I am disposed to consider it as one of those great errors to which great men are said to be liable; and that his most sanguine friends and believers on this question will admit the possibility of his being equally incorrect in the general tenor of his argument.

The next position of the honorable gentleman is, the right of Congress to remove permanently the present Seat of Government. On this question I have already, to a considerable extent, anticipated my argument in the exposition I have given of the Constitution, the laws, and contracts in relation to this subject. The remarks of the gentleman, however, demand a reply. I can justly retort the charge of having assumed premises totally incorrect, and therefore protest against the conclusions drawn from them.

The gentleman, I know, is incapable of intentional misrepresentation; but he has most strangely and most erroneously attributed to me an argument or rather an assertion which I never did or could have used. I did not say that the Constitution fixed the Seat of Government, or in express terms required Congress to establish the permanent seat.

It is, however, on this supposition that the gentleman has triumphantly turned over the pages of the Constitution, and sought in vain for any such terms or express injunctions on Congress. On this basis his argument is built, and he does, indeed, most conclusively prove what was never disputed.

Sir, my argument is that the Constitution contemplated and authorized the establishment of the Seat of the Government of the United States, at a place to be ceded by particular States and accepted by Congress, and over which Congress were to exercise exclusive jurisdiction. The time and manner of executing these powers and performing these duties, were left exclusively to Congress, without any other limitation than as to the extent of territory thus to be acquired, and the objects for which it was so to be acquired. This being an express grant of power for a definite object, necessarily requiring the consent of other parties, and deeply involving the rights and interests of States and individuals, whenever it was exercised, the objects obtained, and the acts consummated by Congress, the Government were bound to fulfil the engagements of Congress, who were quo ad hoc the legitimate agents of the Constitution. The first Congress after the adoption of the Constitution did thus bind the Government by establishing its permanent Seat; and in so doing did not transcend their powers. The gentleman says it is monstrous, it is absurd, to suppose that the people would have consented to vest Congress with such power. Sir, the people did not hesitate to vest Congress with this power, and for the best reasons—to harmonize, to cement and perpetuate the union of these States. Who were to be trusted with this power? The First Congress, men chosen by the people for their firm virtue and distinguished worth, most of them members of the Convention, men to whom the people had trusted, but a little time before, their political existence. Besides, sir, if this was a dangerous power—if it has been abused—the remedy is with the people, as in all other cases of constitutional error or legislative abuse; experience has proved that neither the one or the other exists on the present subject.

The objection as to power would equally apply to all acts of Congress which are binding and irrevocable. It would apply to all cases of compact, of bargain and sale, of grants, and of vested rights of every description. As well might it be contended that Congress has not the right of disposing of all the unappropriated lands of the United States, because by possibility they may give it away or make bad or corrupt bargains. As well might it be said that this Congress may take away the premium given for the late loans; reduce the interest on the public stock, or sponge the debt itself. This legislative omnipotence, which is established by the doctrine that one Legislature can in no case bind a subsequent one, is abhorrent to the first and best principles of the Constitution, destructive of the national faith, and pregnant with evils not to be described.

This doctrine, I had thought, was long ago exposed and exploded by those whom I have considered the firmest champions of the Constitution; but, alas, all those ramparts so strongly erected by those of our political predecessors, whom we have most delighted to honor, and around which we have so often and proudly rallied, seem to me now to be prostrate; the sentinels have fled their posts; the Constitution is the plaything of every idle wind; the sport of every angry passion.

In my remarks the other day, I attempted to point out the analogy between the removal of the Seat of Government and the repeal of the Judiciary, and consequently the analogy between the erection of the two establishments and the principles upon which their permanency depends. The gentleman from New Jersey must excuse me for saying, that his reply to this part of my argument was peculiarly inconclusive. He says that the Seat of Government is not fixed by the Constitution. This is true; but it is equally true, that neither the Supreme or inferior courts are established by the Constitution. The Seat of Government was established by law, resulting from an express grant of power, if not an express requisition of the Constitution. The courts were established precisely in the same way. The immutability of the Supreme Court is admitted by all; the power to destroy the inferior courts is denied by the gentleman from New Jersey, and I presume all his political friends, on the ground of the necessary independence of the judges, and the contract, either express or implied, that they should not be deprived of their offices, either directly or indirectly, during good behaviour. The Constitution does not say, "that Congress shall have power to establish permanent courts, which shall not be changed, nor the law fixing the same shall not be altered or liable to be repealed by any future Congress;" which words the gentleman from New Jersey alleges would have been used had the Constitution intended to give the power to Congress to establish the permanent Seat of the Government. No, sir, the construction in both cases results from the nature of the powers granted, and the objects to be effected. The Constitution authorized but one Supreme Court to be established by Congress—when it was so established the power was executed, the injunction of the Constitution fulfilled—the law could not be repealed. The Constitution authorized but one district of territory, and that not to exceed ten miles square, to be accepted for the Seat of the Government, and that Congress should, like the judges in their respective spheres, be independent; they were to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the territory where the Government was located. The idea, therefore, that Congress may abandon this place at pleasure, is, in my judgment, as incorrect as the destruction of the circuit courts of the United States; and to say that we may surrender the jurisdiction of this District, and acquire another territory where we shall possess the same jurisdiction, or that by the Constitution we possess exclusive jurisdiction over two or more districts of territory, not exceeding each ten miles square—is as absurd as to say that we may destroy the Supreme Court and create another, or to say that we may establish two or more Supreme Courts, with a double set of judges to each.

That I may be the more distinctly understood, and the principles involved in this question more clearly and authoritatively elucidated, I beg leave to read an extract from a celebrated speech of one of the ablest champions of the Constitution on the question of the repeal of the Judiciary, (GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.) I have selected this speech, not because it contains opinions peculiar to its author, but because it embodies the sentiments of the whole party to which he was attached, and may be considered as the base, the pillar, and cap of the argument on that all-important question.

"But (says Mr. Morris in reply) another criticism, but for its effects I would call pleasant, has been made, the amount of which is, you shall not take the man from the office, but you may take the office from the man—you shall not drown him, but you may sink his boat under him; you shall not put him to death, but you may take away his life. The Constitution preserves to a judge his office—says he shall hold it—that is, it shall not be taken from him during good behaviour; the Legislature shall not diminish, though their bounty may increase, his salary. The Constitution provides perfectly for the inviolability of his tenure, but yet we may destroy the office which we cannot take away, as if the destruction of the office would not as effectually deprive him of it as the grant to another person. It is admitted, that no power derived from the Constitution can deprive him of the office, and yet it is contended that, by repeal of the law, that office may be destroyed. Is not this absurd? It had been said, that whatever one Legislature can do, another can undo, because no Legislature can bind its successor; and, therefore, whatever we make we can destroy. This I deny on the ground of reason, and on that of the Constitution. What! can a man destroy his own children? Can you annul your own compacts? Can you annihilate the national debt? When you have by law created a political existence, can you, by repealing the law, dissolve the corporation you had made? When by your laws you give to an individual any right whatever, can you by a subsequent law, rightfully take it away? No; when you make a compact you are bound by it; when you make a promise you must perform it. Establish the contrary doctrine, and what follows! The whim of the moment becomes the law of the land; your country will be looked upon as a den of robbers; every honest man will fly your shores. Who will trust you, when you are the first to violate your own contracts? The position, therefore, that the Legislature may rightfully repeal every law made by a preceding Legislature, when tested by reason is untrue; and it is equally untrue, when compared with the precepts of the Constitution—for what does the Constitution say? You shall make no ex post facto law! Is not this an ex post facto law?"

I now beg gentlemen, particularly those on this side of the House, to pause, to reflect, and compare the sentiments contained in this eloquent and correct extract, with the facts, principles, and obligations connected with the question now before us. I demand of gentlemen to be informed, what will be the political condition of the thirty thousand people who inhabit this District, should the Seat of Government be removed and the jurisdiction of Congress, thus as it unquestionably would be, withdrawn from them? I ask gentlemen if contracts are not in their nature reciprocal, and whether the States of Maryland and Virginia, who surrendered this territory to the United States upon certain terms and conditions, and for certain specific objects, might not with equal propriety and right demand a recession of it from the United States, if their convenience, or interest, or caprice so required as that Congress should, without their consent, throw back the territory on their hands whenever they thought proper? Are a free people, entitled to just rights and equal laws, and who are peculiarly under your guardianship and protection, thus to be sported with, thus to be bought and sold like the slaves of Jamaica? Forbid it justice, forbid it Heaven.

You, by the Constitution and the law, have given to the people of this District a "political existence." Can you rightfully destroy it? You have established here district courts, upon the same principles with the other circuit courts of the United States; the judges and other officers hold their appointments by the same tenure; can you abolish those courts, and drive the judges from their seats? Surely you cannot, consistently with those principles I have always considered as held sacred by those whom I have proudly called my political friends.

In the course of the ingenious argument of the gentleman from New Jersey, I was pleased to discover occasional successful efforts of true and correct principles forcing themselves from the toils in which they were involved. One instance of this was his admission, an admission made, too, by most gentlemen who have spoken, that, in the event of the Government being removed, indemnity was due to those classes of citizens who had settled here and expended their money, relying on the faith of the Government for its continuance at this place. This admission, in my judgment, to a great extent, if not entirely, yields the argument, for why should we indemnify the inhabitants, if we are under no obligations? Why pay them, if we have not deceived and injured them? Shall we, then, violate our obligations; shall we injure and deceive an innocent community and plead a miserable pittance, a promise of tender of amends at our discretion? I cannot think so badly of the Legislature of my country. If the honorable gentleman were acquainted with the real situation of most of the people of this District; if he knew the sacrifices which many of them have made for the promotion and establishment of this city, and the utter ruin in which they would be involved by the fatal measure now threatened, his sense of justice would not be appealed to in vain, for indemnity to an extent infinitely beyond what he now contemplates. It is possible some of the original proprietors may have profited by the establishment of the Seat of Government here, but it is equally true that other proprietors, from whose property the public have derived hundreds of thousands of dollars, have themselves realized little or nothing; their once flourishing and highly cultivated fields cut up by the Government into city lots, remain unsold and unoccupied; this property was, indeed, considered an increasing treasure, which would in time enrich its possessors, and compensate for the sacrifices made to the public. Do the unjust deed now meditated, and you cut up the hopes of those people—you make them poor indeed.

Mr. Speaker, before I close my remarks on the constitutionality of this question, I cannot avoid stating one or two observations more of the gentleman from New Jersey, which my respect for that honorable gentleman, alone, induces me to notice. In attempting to get rid of the common and plain import of the word permanent, so often used in the acts of Congress and of session, the gentleman first tells us that the word permanent is totally to be disregarded; he then says that it was introduced to distinguish the temporary residence of ten years at Philadelphia, from the permanent residence at this place. In this I perfectly agree with him, for no other definition or meaning can be affixed to the term, than the very opposite of temporary, transitory, limited, or any other word which admits the idea of change or limitation. In the next breath we are told the word permanent meant nothing more than that there was no express limitation in the law as to the time the Seat of Government should continue here; consequently it was in the power of Congress to limit its duration and remove it at pleasure. Thus, agreeable to this course of reasoning, the seat of Government was to continue temporarily at Philadelphia for ten years, and then permanently at the City of Washington for six months, or any other period which Congress might think proper. I confess, Mr. Speaker, this reasoning is too refined for my comprehension. It is the first, and I presume will be the last time we shall ever hear that by the force of the terms alone, temporary may be made to embrace a longer time, and give a more lasting tenure, than the word permanent, when applied to the same subject matter. But, sir, admitting for a moment, the possibility of this reasoning being correct; I ask the gentleman if the word permanent was used in reference to the word temporary, in the act as before stated, how did it happen that the same word is used in the original resolution of 1789, which preceded the enactment of the law, and which had no reference or allusion whatever to the temporary residence of the Government at Philadelphia or elsewhere? How did it happen that during the discussion of the resolution, and the bill itself, by the members of the first Congress, so many of those distinguished men should have used the word permanent in its plain, old-fashioned, common sense meaning, without once dreaming of the references, limitations, and qualifications, which the gentleman from New Jersey has so heavily taxed his ingenuity to affix? Sir, the reason is this—they intended the Seat of the Government of the United States should, when established, be as perpetual as the union of these States, as durable as the Constitution itself.

The gentleman to whom I have referred, as also the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) have derived an argument in favor of the right of removal, from the second member of that section of the Constitution which authorizes the establishment of the Seat of Government. It is contended that because the authority of Congress is extended over "all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same may be, for the erection of forts, magazines, dock yards, and other needful buildings," the same obligation exists to continue those forts and other public works, at the sites first fixed upon and purchased, as there is to continue the Seat of the Government at the place ceded by particular States, accepted and established by Congress as the Seat of Government has been.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) has even gone further—he says Congress had no more right to establish the permanent Seat of Government than they had to establish a permanent post road, and that we have the same right to repeal such a law in one case as the other. Had those observations proceeded from gentlemen less entitled to respect and influence, I certainly should have deemed them unworthy of reply. Sir there is little or no analogy in the cases put by the gentlemen. In the purchase of sites for forts or other public buildings, nothing is stipulated for, nothing contemplated, by the Constitution or the law, other than a common bargain and sale for the purchase of so many acres of land, either from a State or from individuals, for public use. Congress are not restricted as to the limits, or number of places thus to be purchased. They require no jurisdiction over citizens residing within the limits of such purchases. On the contrary, no political existence is created, no residence permitted except of military force, no law prevails but martial law. Congress have therefore a right to remove or abandon those public works, and others at pleasure, without any violation of the public faith, or of individual interest, either pecuniary or political. Why the gentleman from New York put the case of a post road, I cannot well imagine. He might as well have told us that we had a right to repeal a tax law, which was not limited to a particular time, or the proceeds pledged to any special or general objects. I leave to gentlemen the full benefit and exclusive right of such arguments as these. But, sir, upon the ordinary principles of contracts, suppose an acre of land was purchased from an individual for the erection of a public fort, on the authority of an act of Congress, declaring the fort thus to be erected on the land purchased should be permanently continued and kept in repair—in consequence of which law, and in consideration of incidental advantages to be derived by the owner of the land, by the erection and continuance of said fort, the owner was induced to part with his property for one fourth of its value, and subject himself to other losses and sacrifices. I ask gentlemen, whether, under such circumstances, Congress could at their next session rightfully repeal the law, and violate their contract with the individual without making him a full and ample indemnity? And suppose, also, that a post road was established which would run through the farm of an individual, greatly to his injury, and, as an inducement for obtaining the privilege, Congress were to enact that the said road should be permanently continued, and authorize commissioners to enter into contracts and stipulations with the owner, by which he would be induced to change his fences, remove his buildings, or erect others, on the faith of the law and engagements entered into with the agents of the Government. Under such circumstances, I appeal to the understanding and common justice of the gentlemen themselves, to determine what would be the duty—what the obligation of Congress? Sir, I have done with this part of the subject, and trust I have sufficiently answered the arguments of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, and established the positions I advanced in relation to the Constitution, the law, and the obligations resulting from them.

So much, Mr. Speaker, has already been said as to the expediency and in expediency of the measure under consideration, (and in which I have borne my part,) that little now remains of use or novelty. When the subject was first ushered into notice, it was advocated solely on the ground of convenience and personal safety of the members. Those reasons appear to have vanished in succession, and a distinct one, not originally thought of, accidentally seized upon, and is made the watchword or rallying point for the advocates of this destructive project. This is, the expense of defending this District, if the Government is continued here. Every day's experience tends to reconcile gentlemen more and more with their new and more humble accommodations in this Hall. Every man who enters this room or approaches the gallery, must be convinced that the business of the session can be transacted here with equal despatch and intelligence as it could have been in the splendid apartments which we lately occupied. This reason is therefore abandoned; indeed, it never appeared to me, to bear a serious aspect; it was impossible it should; for, from the first moment, we found almost every member north of Maryland, and a few of the hardy sons of the West, apparently dissatisfied with their accommodations, while those from the other sections of the Union, with two or three exceptions, perfectly satisfied. It is perfectly evident, therefore, to me, that as this was in general not so much an individual as a sectional difference of opinion, the objection did not in reality exist. It is impossible, for instance, that the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. STOCKTON) and myself could so essentially differ as to the size of this room, the state of its atmosphere, or the quality of our seats, whether hard or soft. The same remarks equally apply as to the danger or security of remaining here. It is not possible that gentlemen from the North and East should be filled with apprehensions for their personal safety, while those from the Southern and middle States, whose nerves may, from climate, be supposed more delicate, should remain unappalled. Sir, I know the nerve of some of those gentlemen too well to believe they would be the first to fly even on the approach of danger, much less before it approaches. I cannot believe, sir, that the bold and daring spirit of the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) could yield to imaginary fears, while other gentlemen in this House remain unmoved. I cannot believe the young, the strong, and vigorous limbs of himself and his colleague, (Mr. FITSK.) could tremble, while my venerable colleagues, (Messrs. MACON and FORNEY,) and other gentlemen whom either age or accident has disqualified for the toils and dangers of the camp, and who would certainly not be foremost in pedestrian feats, remained firm and unshaken.

Gentlemen, however, have entrenched themselves, as they conceive, on the ground of expense. They have most strangely and most erroneously misrepresented the expense which will be incurred for the defence of this District. The exaggerated statements on this subject are the more unfair and unaccountable, because they are not only contrary to fact and contrary to the express representations of the chairman of the Military Committee, but in total disregard of the estimates and plans of defence derived from the War Department. I, sir, am as regardful of public expenditure as any member of this House; and I have no doubt, those gentlemen who think with me on the present subject are not less economical; are not less opposed to useless or improper dispositions of the public force and public treasure than those who are in favor of incurring the expense, the loss of time, and other fatal consequences of removing the Seat of Government, are to be considered the exclusive guardians of the public safety, the public honor and the public purse. The fact is this: The military force which has been spoken of, is intended for the defence, not of the District of Columbia alone, but for the whole of the tenth military district, including the whole State of Maryland, part of Pennsylvania and Virginia. This force is to be so disposed, as conveniently to be brought into action for the protection of Baltimore, Annapolis, the District of Columbia, or any point between the Potomac and Baltimore. So that in truth, whether Congress remain here or go away, the force will be the same; the expense neither increased nor diminished one cent. But, sir, if considerable additional expense were to be incurred, I appeal to the patriots of my country to know, to what more laudable object it could be applied than to the defence of the heart of the country; to the security of the Government itself, and the protection of those institutions founded and cherished by a Washington? By his precepts and his institutions I will cling, as the anchor of our hope—the rock of our political salvation.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. FISK) objects to the disposition of the force contemplated by the Secretary of War. He says, if they are stationed on the middle ground between this District and Baltimore, they can only be brought to action in rear of the enemy. I know not in what school that gentleman acquired his military science—whether he practises on the lessons of the great Frederick, the Prince of Conde, and other heroes of former days, or whether he relies on modern improvements in the art of war introduced by the Emperor of Elba, or even our late Secretary of War, John Armstrong. I know not, but I have always understood, that if the enemy could be outflanked or attacked in the rear, victory was half complete. I profess very little knowledge in military matters, but I will inform the gentleman that the situation where the troops are intended to be stationed will enable them to attack the enemy either in front or rear, as circumstances may justify. It is also objected that this is a militia force. I pray you, sir, what other force have we in any of the States? What other force do you expect at Philadelphia, or any other place to which we may remove? None. Permit me here to remark, that if the dispersion of Congress is an object with the enemy, as gentlemen suppose, that object can be as well obtained at Philadelphia as this place; and I have the authority (if any were necessary) of military men for saying, that Philadelphia is less defensible than this District. Consequently, if we go there, we not only increase the danger, but the expense also.

he is not afraid, and he believes few or none are afraid of remaining here; but he says he wishes to avoid the disgrace of having the Government again routed and driven away; and how is this to be done? By marching off when there is no danger? In other words, it is disgraceful to retreat when pressed by a superior force, but honorable to run before the approach of danger. This is indeed a new chapter in chivalry, and one which I am sure the gentleman will not adopt as a guide for his own conduct. This sentiment is also rather at points with what fell from the honorable gentleman only a moment before; the country, he said, was disgraced. The Administration had drank the very dregs of humiliation by permitting the enemy to pollute the soil of this District and riot in the Capitol of the country. This is but too true a picture; and I admonish gentlemen not to heighten this disgrace—not to consummate our degradation, by adopting the measure now proposed. Already has the pen fallen in pity—in shame and confusion, from the hand of the historian. Destroy your Seat of Government! Break asunder this strongest link in the Federal chain! The pen of history will be snatched up with rage and indignation, and this monstrous deed portrayed in all its blackest colors.

Mr. Speaker, the unusual combination in favor of this measure, by gentlemen of the most opposite political opinions, cannot fail to strike the attention of the House, and may well justify the apprehension that, with some at least, other and very different views may be entertained from those which have been expressed in debate. I therefore admonish gentlemen, while they are travelling the same road with their new companions, that they inquire and well understand what and where is the destined object. If political considerations are in view, it would be well for these extremes of political parties, which have met together on this single occasion, to perfectly understand each other before it is too late to return. The gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) did me no more than justice in supposing that I meant no personal reflection, when I represented the other day this novel coalition, by a figure perhaps rather ludicrous: "The horn of Federalism hooked to the tail of Democracy, or vice versa." The alternative presented to gentlemen of being at the head or tail of this political association precludes the idea of any invidious distinction. The gentleman says he is fond of union. So am I, in a just and laudable object; but rather than unite in error, let me remain in everlasting exile. As I impeach not the motives of gentlemen, I will not withhold from them my congratulations on this their first political wedding. I wish them all the delights of the honeymoon. I fear it will be of short duration. Perhaps before to-morrow's noon matters of State may demand, and their divorce be pronounced.

Mr. Speaker, I have claimed your attention and that of the House longer I fear than was agreeable; but not longer, I trust, than the importance of the subject demanded. I forbear a detail of all the evil consequences to be apprehended to the nation from the adoption of the measure now before us. I will not harrow your feelings by even a feeble effort to portray the complicated sufferings, the deep distress in which this people would be involved. I yield to the admonition of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) and banish as much as possible the influence of feelings; even that gentleman, with all his sternness and zeal on this occasion, has expressed some sympathy for the fate which awaits this people. Sir, the human being who could not do more than feel for such calamity, must possess a heart colder than apathy itself. "There are occasions when the worst men only can be cool." Those alone can jest at scars who never felt a wound.

NOTES.

The following extracts are from the speeches of distinguished members of the First Congress.

On the 27th of August, 1789, Mr. Scott, of Pennsylvania, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That a permanent residence ought to be fixed for the General Government of the United States, at some convenient place, as near the centre of wealth, population, and extent of territory, as may be consistent with convenience to the navigation of the Atlantic ocean, and having due regard to the particular situation of the Western country.

Mr. Hartley, of Pennsylvania, was in favor of the motion. He thought some attention ought to be paid to the petitions of the people respecting a permanent Seat of Government.

Mr. Fitzsimons, of Pennsylvania, acknowledged there was business of great importance before Congress; but was there any more important than the subject proposed? It was a question in which the people of every part of the Union were deeply interested. It had been said that jealousies existed among the States; they were not likely to be removed by inattention to so great a concern.

Mr. Scott thought the principles of the Union were the principles of equal justice and reciprocity. He conceived the question now before the House as grand a link as any in the Federal chain. The future tranquillity and well being of the United States, he said, depended as much on this as on any other question that ever had or could come before Congress. It was a justice due to the extremities of the continent to adopt such a measure.

Mr. Jackson, of Georgia, said that upon this subject depended the existence of the Union. The place of the Seat of Government was important in every point of view. It might be compared to the heart of the human body; it was a centre from which the principles of life were carried to the extremities, and from these might return again with precision.

Mr. Ames, of Massachusetts, said he ever found it a difficult task, on the most trivial occasions, to obtain unanimity. What then must be the division on a question which some gentlemen have said the existence of the Union depended upon? I believe it will involve as many passions as the human heart can display. Every principle of local interest, pride, and honor, and even patriotism itself, are engaged. He asked if the public mind ought not to be better prepared for the occasion?

September 3, 1789.

Mr. Goodhue, of Massachusetts, said the Eastern members, with the members from New York, have agreed to fix a place on national principles, without regard to their own convenience, and have turned their minds to the banks of the Susquehanna. Motives of convenience would have led us to fix upon the banks of the Delaware, but it was supposed it would give more lasting content to go farther South. They were therefore entirely of opinion that the banks of the Susquehanna should be the place of the permanent residence of the General Government. Mr. G. then moved a resolution, "that the permanent Seat of the General Government ought to be on the east bank of the Susquehanna."

Mr. Lee, of Virginia, hoped they would be guided in this discussion and decision by the great principles on which the Government itself is founded. With this view he introduced a preamble (recognising the principles of the Constitution, and declaring that those great objects will be best effected by establishing the permanent Seat of Government as nearly central as a convenient water communication with the Atlantic and an easy access to the Western territory will permit) to the following resolution: "That a place as nearly central as a convenient communication with the Atlantic ocean and an easy access to the Western territory will permit, ought to be selected and established as the permanent Seat of the Government of the United States." Mr. L. wished the principles of the Government to be recognised, that the people of the United States may be able to judge whether, in the measures about to be adopted, they are carried into execution by this House.

Mr. Sedgwick, of Massachusetts, had thought that this was not the time consistently with the good of the country to determine the permanent residence of Congress. He was however ready to decide on the important subject.

Mr. Vining, of Delaware, agreed this was a matter of the highest importance. He wished that all exterior circumstances might combine in aid of Government, and every principle attended to which could preserve and add strength to it. While we had a WASHINGTON, and his virtues, to cement and guard this Union, it might be safe; but when he should leave us, who would inherit his virtues and possess his influence; who would remain to embrace and draw to a centre those hearts which the authority of his virtues alone kept in union?

Mr. Lee, of Virginia, said a question was to be decided which involves present and future interests, and extends to remote generations. The question is to be settled, which must determine whether this Government is to exist for ages, or be dispersed among contending winds. Will gentlemen say these principles ought not to be recognised? Will they say the centre of Government should not be the centre of the Union? Should it not be a situation which will admit an easy communication to the ocean? Will they say our Western brethren are to be disregarded? These are momentous considerations which should lead the House to a conclusion. If they are disregarded, it will be an alarming circumstance to the people of the Southern States. They have felt their alarms already.

Mr. Stone said, in fixing the permanent residence, we ought not only to have in view the immediate importance of the States, but what is likely to be their weight at a future day. After stating the probable future importance of the Western country, Mr. S. observed that the river Potomac, which had been mentioned by the Southern gentlemen, for the permanent Seat of the Government, is, as far as I am acquainted, extremely well calculated to furnish Government with the key of the country; and a river I believe richer in its exports than any I have contemplated on the face of the earth.

Mr. Madison, of Virginia, said he hoped that all would concur in the great principle on which they ought to conduct, and decide this business; an equal attention to the rights of the community. If these great rights be the basis of republics, and if there be a double necessity of attending to them in a Federal Republic, it is further to be considered, that there is no one right, of which the people can judge with more ease and certainty, and of which they will judge with more jealousy, than of the establishment of the permanent Seat of Government; and I am persuaded that however often this subject may be discussed in the representative body, or however the attention of the committee may be drawn to it, the observations I have made will be more and more verified. If we consider, sir, the effects of Legislative power on the aggregate community, we must feel equal inducements to look for the centre, in order to find the present Seat of Government. Those who are most adjacent to the seat of legislation, will always possess advantages over others. An earlier knowledge of the laws; a greater influence in enacting them; better opportunities for anticipating them, and a thousand other circumstances, will give a superiority to those who are thus situated. If it were possible to promulgate our laws, by some instantaneous operation, it would be of less consequence in that point of view where the Government might be placed; but if, on the contrary, time is necessary for this purpose, we ought, as far as possible, to put every part of the community on a level. If we consider the influence of the Government in its Executive Department, there is no less reason to conclude that it ought to be placed in the centre of the Union. It ought to be in a situation to command information relative to every part of the Union, to watch every conjuncture, to seize every circumstance that can be improved. The Executive eye ought to be placed where it can best see the dangers which may threaten, and the Executive arm, whence it may be extended most effectually to the protection of every part. In the Judiciary department, if it is not equally necessary, it is highly important that the Government should be equally accessible to all. With respect to the Western Territory, we are not to expect it, for it would be an affront to the understanding of our fellow-citizens on the Western waters, that they will be united with their Atlantic brethren, on any other principle than that of equality and justice. He was sure, that if justice required us to take any one position in preference to another, we had every inducement, both of interest and of prudence, to fix on the Potomac, as most satisfactory to our Western brethren. On a candid view of the two rivers, (Susquehanna and Potomac,) he flattered himself that the seat which would most correspond with the public interest would be found on the banks of the Potomac. It was proper that we should have some regard to the centre of territory; if that was to have weight, he begged leave to say that there was no comparison between the two rivers. He defied any gentleman to cast his eye, in the most cursory manner, over a map, and say, that the Potomac is not much nearer this centre than any part of the Susquehanna. If we measure from the banks of the Potomac to the most Eastern part of the United States, it is less distant than to the most Southern. If we measure this great area diagonally, the Potomac will still have the advantage. If you draw a line perpendicularly, to the direction of the Atlantic coast, we shall find that it will run more equally through the Potomac than through any other part of the Union; or, if there be any difference between one side and the other, there will be a greater space on the Southwest than on the Northern. All the maps of the United States show the truth of this. He granted that the present centre of population is nearer the Susquehanna than the Potomac. But are we choosing a Seat of Government for the present moment only? He presumed not.

The adoption of the resolve was further opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky, FORSYTH of Georgia, HAWKINS of Kentucky, BOWEN and RHEA of Tennessee; and advocated by Messrs. SHARP of Kentucky, and INGERSOLL of Pennsylvania.

The question on the passage of the resolution was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyles, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Findley, Fisk of New York, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Lyle, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickering, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Shipperd, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of North Carolina, Loefferts, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey—71.

So the resolution was agreed to, and a committee appointed to bring in a bill in pursuance thereof.

Mr. FISK, of New York, Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. SHARP, Mr. INGERSOLL, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. PEARSON, and Mr. LEWIS, were appointed the said committee.

MONDAY, October 7.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, WILLIAM S. SMITH; and from Kentucky, SAMUEL HOPKINS; appeared, and took their seats.

The bill for extending the right of suffrage, &c., in the Mississippi Territory, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

According to the order of the day, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Thomas Cutts, of the District of Maine, who prays reimbursement of moneys paid for property purchased at a marshal's sale, together with costs and damages on the recovery of said property from him by a third person, by due process of law.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, opposed the adoption of the report, which was supported by Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, the chairman of the committee who made it, &c.

The report of the Committee of Claims was finally reversed by the Committee of the Whole, and so reported to the House. It was then ordered to lie on the table for further consideration.

A communication was received from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the subject of Indian cessions; which was ordered to lie on the table. Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, October 10.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL TAGGART; from Maryland, SAMUEL RINGGOLD; from North Carolina, WILLIAM KENNEDY; and from Louisiana, THOMAS BOLLING ROBERTSON; appeared, and took their seats.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed joint resolutions "expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Captain Thomas Macdonough, the officers, seamen, marines, and infantry, acting as marines, on board the United States' squadron on Lake Champlain," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The resolutions were read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

An engrossed bill further to extend the right of suffrage, and to increase the number of members of the Legislative Council of the Mississippi Territory, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. OAKLEY,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to lay before this House a statement of the return of the direct tax and the internal duties, established by the several acts passed at the first session of the present Congress, as far as the same have been received, showing—

First, The assessment made of houses, lands, and slaves, in the several collection districts in the several States, and the aggregate of assessments in each State.

Secondly, The amount received on account of the direct tax from each State, and from each collection district in the several States.

Thirdly, The amount received on account of each of the said internal duties, distinguishing the amount received on account of each from the States, respectively, and from each collection district in the several States.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the resolutions reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Major General Brown, and Brigadiers Scott, Gaines, and Macomb; and, after some time spent therein the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a joint resolution "empowering the Joint Library Committee of Congress to contract for the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said resolution was read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on so much of the President's Message as relates to the finances of the United States; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The report is as follows:

That taxes, loans, and Treasury notes, appear to be the resources on which we must rely for carrying on the war. The product of the first cannot be commanded in time to meet the immediate demands on the Treasury. A reliance on loans, in the present situation of this country, would be uncertain; and the terms on which they would be obtained, not such as to induce a resort to them at the present moment. Treasury notes, combined with a system of taxation, more extended than the one heretofore adopted, will it is believed, in the present state of bank credit, be found to be a much better resource. The want of some medium, which, resting on a firm and solid basis, may unite public confidence, and have a general, instead of a local circulation, is now universally acknowledged. The stoppage of specie payments by the principal banks of the Middle States has embarrassed greatly the operations of the Treasury, and, by confining the circulation of notes to the limits of the States within which they are issued, has deprived the Government of all the facilities, in the remittance of money, which was afforded while public confidence gave to bank notes a general circulation. The notes of New York and Philadelphia will not be received in Boston; the notes of Baltimore, or of the District of Columbia, will not answer for payments in Philadelphia. If, by any new modification, Treasury notes could be made to answer the purposes of a circulating medium between the different States, they would greatly facilitate the operations of Government, and free from embarrassment the transactions of individuals. To secure their circulation, it would be necessary—1. To issue the notes in sums sufficiently small for the ordinary purposes of society; 2. To allow the individual who holds them to fund them at pleasure at any of the loan offices, and to receive their amount in stock of the United States, bearing an interest of 8 per cent.; 3. To make them payable to bearer, and transferrable by delivery; 4. To make them receivable in all payments for public lands and taxes; 5. To pledge, for the payment of the interest on the amount issued, so much of the internal duties as shall be necessary. To prevent an accumulation of circulating medium, the United States to retain the power, on giving six months' notice, of redeeming them with specie, or exchanging for them stock, bearing an interest of 8 per cent. If these provisions are adopted, and taxes imposed, which shall manifest clearly the ability of the Government to meet its engagements, our present difficulties will vanish, confidence be restored, and the capital, hoarded by avarice, or locked up from timidity, will be again restored to the accustomed channels of circulation. In presenting additional objects of taxation, care has been taken to select such as will bear equally on every portion of the community. In Europe, the price of agricultural products is not materially affected by a state of war; the produce of the earth is there consumed within the country, in peace and in war. The situation of the United States is totally different. With an extensive and fertile country, and a small population, compared to the extent of our territory, we have annually a large surplus to export to foreign markets, over and above what is necessary for consumption. On the export of this surplus, which is cut off by war, depends in a great degree the ability of the farmer to meet taxes. While, however, war depresses the agricultural interest, it gives vigor to various manufactures. By destroying all foreign competition, the war has brought many of these manufactures to a state of perfection, which will secure their successful prosecution, even after peace shall be restored. In times of difficulty and danger, we must appeal to the patriotism of every class of our citizens. These establishments, under the fostering hand of the Government, have grown to maturity, and will not hesitate to bear, with the agricultural interests, their portion of the taxes necessary to maintain, unimpaired, that character for punctuality and good faith for which the American Government has heretofore been distinguished. Several of these manufactures have been selected as proper subjects of taxation; and it is proposed to unite with the taxes a pledge of the public faith for the continuance of the double duties until the tax shall be repealed.

The committee deem it unnecessary, at present, to present any view of the expenditures for the next year, reserving a report on that subject until the estimates from the Treasury shall be forwarded. Confining, therefore, this report to the additional taxes necessary for the support of the public credit, they submit the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue the direct tax, and to increase the same 50 per cent.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to increase the duty on spirits distilled, by an additional duty of 12½ cents on the gallon.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to add 100 per cent on the present duty on sales at auction.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to add 50 per cent. to the present duty on the conveyance of papers and letters.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient to impose a duty on the following articles, viz: manufactured tobacco and snuff, in the hands of the manufacturer; candles, of tallow and spermaceti; hats; cotton yarn, spun by the aid of machinery, worked by steam or water; leather; pig iron; castings; bar, rolled, and slit iron, and on nails made by the aid of machinery; on furniture above a certain value, except beds, bedding, and articles of domestic manufacture, in the hands of the owner; beer, ale, and porter, in the hands of the manufacturer; boots and shoes, above a certain price, in the hands of the manufacturer; on plated harness, in the hands of the owner; on vats for the manufacture of paper; on saddles and bridles, above a certain price, in the hands of the owner; on gold and silver watches, in the hands of the owner; on pleasure horses, kept

NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress communications just received from the Plenipotentiaries of the United States, charged with negotiating peace with Great Britain; showing the conditions on which alone that Government is willing to put an end to the war.

The instructions to those Plenipotentiaries, disclosing the grounds on which they were authorized to negotiate and conclude a Treaty of Peace, will be the subject of another communication.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, October 10, 1814.

The Message and communications were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FORSYTH moved that five thousand copies be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, moved to amend the resolution by inserting "ten thousand copies" in the place of "five thousand." He said he was persuaded the information communicated in the Message had awakened but one feeling throughout the House, and stamped the same impression on every member. It had always been his opinion that it became not this Government to stand on idle, frivolous etiquette, but to speak to the enemy, if indeed we desired to convert him to a friend, to speak to him frankly, plainly, and directly, to the end that all ground for his doubting our sincerity might be removed. He trusted that it would appear that our Commissioners had been instructed so to speak, and that they had so spoken. If, then, on fair and honorable terms proposed, England should have denied us peace; if other and new claims had been set up; if she has attempted to annex degrading and humiliating conditions; *if she has presumed to trench upon our ascertained rights as hitherto acknowledged and enjoyed, from that moment Mr. H.'s determination had long since been formed to unite in supporting the most vigorous system of honorable war, with the hope of bringing the enemy to a sense of justice. Mr. H. was satisfied that nothing more was necessary to make the war national than to convince the people that an honest and fair effort had been made to obtain peace, and it had been denied upon terms mutually honorable. From that moment it ceased to be a party war, and of necessity became national. Mr. H. said he too well knew the party with which it had been his pride and happiness to act, to doubt of their determining to bear a just share of the sacrifices to be incurred in defending the honor of the nation in a war that becomes just. Forgetting, as far as possible, their objections to the Administration; stifling their complaints as far as might be against the party that supports it; sacrificing all minor considerations; endeavoring to bury in oblivion the numerous wrongs inflicted upon their party; omitting, to every proper extent, a retrospect of the past, and looking to the present and the future, for the purpose of staunching the bleeding wounds of their country, they would stand forth in this her hour of peril, in asserting and maintaining her established rights and honor. But, sir, said Mr. H., while we have ever been ready to sacrifice our political feelings upon the altar of our country, the sacred duty we owe to it will require of us never to cease insisting on a reform in the measures of the Government, and the choice of honorable and enlightened men, competent to conduct its affairs in a crisis so awful. Unfortunately for the country, the character of the men who now directed its destinies was not of this description; nor did they possess the confidence of the nation.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, said that it was not necessary for him on this occasion to reiterate the sentiments of his honorable friend (Mr. HANSON.) His friend, he was confident, had expressed the feelings and opinions of those gentlemen with whom he was accustomed to act, on the nature and character of the demands and pretensions of the British Government, as developed in the despatches just read to the House. He did not hesitate, in the fullest manner, to declare, that those demands and pretensions were utterly inadmissible under any circumstances. But, Mr. O. said, while he made this declaration, and while he felt, in common with all gentlemen, the conviction that there could be but one sentiment in the nation, as to the necessity of resisting, by all the means in our power, the unjust and arrogant claims of the enemy, he felt bound to remark, that he could never forget by whom and upon what grounds the nation had been involved in this war, upon the issue of which were now staked the essential rights and honor of the country. The character given by the enemy to the war, had put at hazard these rights and that honor, and they must now be vindicated at an incalculable expense of treasure and blood. Mr. O. said it was notorious, that, at the commencement of the war, a great portion of the people of this country thought it rash and unnecessary. If the Administration had been willing to make peace on terms which could be expected to unite the approbation of the nation, they must have been prepared to abandon some of the grounds on which it had been declared. Their conduct in the late negotiation could not be properly estimated until the instructions to our Commissioners are laid before the House. This, Mr. O. said, he perceived was to be done. It would then appear how far they had thought it important to maintain the grounds on which they had deemed it expedient to commence a war; the conclusion of which was not now within their control, and appeared to be removed to a hopeless distance.

Mr. O. said, it was indispensable to the safety of the nation, that its affairs, at this awful crisis, should be committed to the management of men who could reasonably be expected to unite the confidence of the nation; and who, when they had compelled the enemy to abandon his unjust and insulting pretensions, would not throw new obstacles in the way of peace, by setting up any unwarrantable claims on our part. He would tell gentlemen in sober earnestness, that a war which, to be successful, must be waged by the united means and vigor of the nation, could never be conducted to an honorable issue by a party Administration.

Besides the above remarks of Mr. HANSON and Mr. OAKLEY, which are reported with critical correctness, a few remarks were made by Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, and Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, the first acquiescing in Mr. HANSON's motion, and the second approving the spirit of the remarks of Mr. H., his colleague.

The motion to print ten thousand copies was agreed to.

TUESDAY, October 11.

Another member, to wit: from New York, ABRAHAM HASBROUCK, appeared, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER presented a petition from Peter Landais, praying to be paid his share of prize money for British vessels captured during the Revolutionary War by the American frigate the Alliance, under his command.—Laid on the table.

HONORS TO THE BRAVE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolutions expressive of the sense entertained by Congress of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Major Generals Brown, Scott, and Gaines, and Brigadier General Macomb. These resolutions were yesterday amended in committee by the insertion of the names of Generals P. B. Porter, Ripley, and Miller. These amendments were, after considerable debate, confirmed by the House. The resolution approbatory of the conduct of Brigadier General Macomb was also amended, on the motion of Mr. SHIPERD, of New York, by adding thereto the names of Major General Mooers of the New York militia, and Major General Strong of the militia of Vermont.

The resolutions thus amended, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—Ayes 93.

LIBRARY FOR CONGRESS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution authorizing the Library Committee of Congress to contract for the purchase of the library of Mr. Jefferson.

The letter of Mr. Jefferson to Samuel H. Smith, Esq., offering the library to Congress on their own terms and their own time of payment, to replace in some degree the loss sustained in this respect by the recent invasion, was read. The letter states that the collection has been the work of fifty years and of great care and attention (and said to consist of ten thousand volumes)—a collection which he had designed, at his death, to have offered the refusal of to Congress—but this intention, the letter states, is hastened by the recent events, as the few years yet left to him would afford him but a barren use of this extensive and valuable library.—[For which letter see Senate Proceedings, ante page 24.]

After much desultory conversation, as to the value of this library, the nature of the selection, &c., the Committee rose (in order, apparently, to give further time to the members to examine the catalogue) and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, October 12.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, from the Committee of Naval Affairs, reported without amendment the resolution from the Senate in honor of Captain Macdonough, his officers and crew; and they were made the order of the day for tomorrow.

The resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by the Congress of the United States of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Generals Brown, Scott, Gaines, Ripley, and Miller, of the Army, and General P. B. Porter of the New York militia, and General Macomb of the Army, were read a third time, as amended.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, moved to recommit the same for amendment; alleging, as a reason therefor, that the amendments which had been incorporated in the resolutions afforded a strong objection to their passage.

After a debate of about two hours, the motion of Mr. OAKLEY was agreed to, and the resolutions were committed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they had passed a joint resolution relative to the capture of the British sloop of war L'Epervier by the Peacock; which resolve was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

H. OF R.

The order of the day on Mr. JACKSON's motion to amend the Constitution having been called up, on motion of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, the further consideration of the same was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, the first Monday in December next.

THURSDAY, October 13.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, gave notice that he should to-morrow call up the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the additional taxes.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, called up the report for this day, but the House overruled his motion.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, of New York, a resolution was adopted, instructing the Secretary of War to make a report to the House, of the claims of the several States and Territories for moneys advanced in paying the expenses of the militia of any State or Territory, heretofore called out under the authority of such State or Territory, for the purpose of repelling invasion or defending it from the incursion of the enemy—specifying what calls, if any, have not been sanctioned by the President of the United States, and distinguishing the items which, under existing laws, may be adjusted and settled, and such also as cannot be settled without legislative provision.

HONOR TO THE BRAVE.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Military Committee, reported the resolutions, yesterday referred to them, in the following amended form:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be and they are hereby presented to Major General Brown, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the successive battles of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie, in Upper Canada, in which British veteran troops were beaten and repulsed by equal or inferior numbers, and that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, emblematical of these triumphs, and presented to Major General Brown.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Major General Scott, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of his distinguished services in the successive conflicts of Chippewa and Niagara, and of his uniform gallantry and good conduct in sustaining the reputation of the arms of the United States.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause silver medals to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Brigadier General Ripley, Brigadier General Miller, and Brigadier General Porter, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of their gallantry and good conduct in the several conflicts of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie.

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be and they are hereby presented to Brigadier General Gaines, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in defeating the enemy at Erie, on the 15th of August, repelling with great slaughter the attack of a British veteran army superior in numbers, and that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, emblematical of this triumph, and presented to Brigadier General Gaines.

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be and they are hereby presented to Brigadier General Macomb, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in defeating the enemy at Plattsburg, on the 11th of September, repelling with 1,500 men, aided by a body of militia and volunteers from New York and Vermont, a British veteran army greatly superior in number, and that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, emblematical of this triumph, and presented to Brigadier General Macomb.

No debate took place on this report, except a few words on the subject of an amendment proposed by Mr. GHOLSON, which he afterwards withdrew.

The report was accepted without opposition, and ordered to be read a third and last time to-day. [But, before it could be engrossed for that purpose, the House had adjourned.]

THE BATTLE ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

The House, on motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolutions from the Senate, expressive of the sense of Congress of the importance and brilliancy of the decisive victory obtained by Commodore Thomas Macdonough and his brave officers and men.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, said, before the question was taken upon the resolutions, he would take the liberty of submitting to the consideration of the Committee a few remarks. Whatever, said he, may be the difference of opinion among us, as to the manner or the measure of approbation which we will bestow upon our land officers and soldiers, I believe there is but one sentiment as to our seamen. Fortunately for our country, the occasions of just and honorable eulogium upon them have been so frequent, that the practice is fully settled, the precedents completely established. The subject of the resolutions before you, is the victory obtained by Commodore Macdonough and his gallant comrades on Lake Champlain, over a superior British squadron, on the memorable 11th of September last—a victory in itself equal to any one which has been achieved by our navy; in its consequences certainly surpassed by none. A view of the relative strength of the two squadrons will convince us that this victory was in itself equal to any one which has preceded it. It is sufficient to observe, that in almost every particular, perhaps in every one, the advantage was on the side of the enemy. The action was commenced by him in the fullest confidence of success. He chose his own time; he took his own distance; he was animated by the presence of a great army, spectators of the contest. He was stimulated by that spirit of emulation which never ceases to exist between the Army and Navy. He had every reason to believe that, upon the successful issue of the naval contest, depended the successful issue of the campaign. Thus situated, and thus wrought upon by motives so powerful, he would probably have been successful had he not been opposed by men actuated by feelings of a character somewhat different, but perhaps of still more powerful influence. The Americans were, in every sense of the word, fighting for their country. That country was likely to fall under one of the severest scourges to which any country can be exposed. The City of Washington had just before fallen a prey to the invaders—there was good reason to believe that Baltimore was on the eve of destruction—perhaps destroyed. The determination to lay waste and destroy all the assailable parts of our country had been announced in form. A ferocious determination, sir! Adopted, we are assured, at the special instance of the Governor of Canada. A combination of more powerful incentives to exertion has seldom addressed itself to the human mind. Under its influence our brave countrymen fought; and under its influence they conquered. The consequences of their victory are known to all united America. To recite them would be superfluous; I shall not undertake it, sir. All I ask is, and I ask it with pleasure, because I am sure I shall receive it, the undivided sentiment of this House in favor of the resolutions.

No opposition or amendment being made, the resolutions were reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading; and were accordingly read a third time, and passed by an unanimous vote.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the select committee to whom the subject was referred, reported the following bill:

A bill for the temporary removal of the Seat of Government from the City of Washington.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the first session of Congress to be held after the termination of the present war between the United States and Great Britain, shall be held at the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to which place the public offices attached to the Seat of the Government of the United States shall, at the commencement of the said session, together with the Seat of the Government of the United States, be transferred; and, from and after that time, shall cease to be held or exercised elsewhere.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, having objected to the second reading of the bill—

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved to reject the bill, and thereon demanded the yeas and nays. The reason he assigned for it was, that instead of being engaged on a subject of this kind, the House ought to be engaged in matters of high importance, in which the destinies of the nation are involved. He would call the attention of gentlemen to the despatches from Europe, which, he thought, would clearly indicate that other objects than this ought to occupy the attention of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he most sincerely regretted that this course had been taken with the bill. If gentlemen were friends to this District, if they wished the question decided in such a way as would quiet the minds of the people of the District, they ought to refrain from pushing this question now, when many were absent who did not expect it to come on. If, when all the members were present, there should appear to be a majority against the bill, the question would be fairly settled; but a surprise of this sort could not decide it. The question was one, he said, of trying importance, not only to the District, but to other parts of the nation. It ought to be decided by a full vote. Until it was so settled, if against removal, there is not one citizen who ought to have confidence in the permanence of the Seat of Government. Gentlemen ought to deal liberally, and let the business take the usual course. If this course was taken, the real question would not be decided, but would be subject to continual agitation.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said, so far as he was personally concerned, he denied the imputation of intending to obtain a vote by surprise; he was not operated upon by any such consideration. He was not, he said, peculiarly a friend to the people of this District; it was not on their account he was opposed to the bill. It was the intrinsic importance of this question to the nation at large, that demanded his attention. It was necessary this question should be settled, and promptly settled. He had no idea that any member could be taken by surprise, and he was indeed surprised at the remark. This question had been amply discussed, and there was nothing to be said on the subject, &c. By referring to the bill, it would be seen that the bill could not possibly pass, and the Seat of Government be removed within thirty days; before which time the season would afford ample security against the approach of an enemy.

OCTOBER, 1814.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

H. OF R.

By that time all the arguments which had been urged in favor of a removal would be done away by the rigor of the season. As to personal inconvenience from sitting here, he did not believe any gentleman could or would be influenced by motives of that character. There was now no reason for removal. If reasons should hereafter occur, it would be then time enough for Congress to remove.

Mr. FISK, of New York, said he very much regretted that this motion had been submitted to the consideration of the House. The principles of this bill had been more than once before the House, who had decided in favor of the removal; and it could not be expected they were now prepared to reject the bill. The exposure of this place and the expense of sitting here were as great now as they had been before. As to the argument that time will render this place secure, Mr. F. said he would answer the gentleman, for the enemy, as a French marshal had once replied to some such remark, that he would not consult the enemy as to the time or place of meeting him. Mr. F. said we were now situated four hundred miles from the most important seat of war, with which daily and expeditious communication was all-important, as well to the facility of supplies as to the combination of movement and action, &c. The increase of expense thus incurred, he said, amounted to a greater sum than would the cost of removal of the public offices to Philadelphia or New York. To brave all these inconveniences merely in consideration of the interests of the people of this District, would be to pervert the Constitutional provision which gives Congress exclusive legislation over the District, and instead of that, would be giving to the District the control over Congress. Mr. F. said he viewed the interests of the citizens of this District with the same consideration as he did those of all other citizens; but they had, he presumed, too much good sense and patriotism to ask Congress, merely out of regard to their personal views, to compromise the national interests. They were not to be ruined, either, by a permanent removal; for the bill itself provided for the return of Congress to this place after the war. Congress would be equally exposed, and require the same expenditure for their protection, at every session during the war as they were now. Gentlemen had said the enemy would not come here now, because they could find no object. It had been supposed that the enemy could have no object in coming here before, but he had come. Was it not necessary, not only that the members should feel themselves secure from personal danger, but also from fear of interruption? Should not the creditors of the Government be satisfied of the safety of Congress? And when we speak of them, said Mr. F., let us not pass them over with a bare mention. On whom must we rely for the support of our finances—for the sinews to carry on the war? Where are the moneyed men? Are they here? He meant by this no invidious distinctions. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MAÇON) had the other day called the attention of the House to the character of the votes for removal, which were all from the North and East—from the moneyed men who wielded the capital of the nation. Let gentlemen reflect that these men would not advance their money with the same confidence to the Government at this place as if it were removed. This was the explanation which he would give of those votes. Was it not true that confidence in the public securities had been for a moment withdrawn on the occupation of the city by the enemy? If we have not now the means of meeting the public creditors, if we cannot look them in the face, if, by a temporary removal from this place, we can fulfil our engagements and redeem the public faith, which would be violated by remaining here, Mr. F. asked if they ought not to remove? As to the urgency of more important business to prevent the consideration of this, Mr. F. said this complaint was without reason. Let it be recollected that Congress had met and adjourned at twelve o'clock, or a little after, every day during the present session; but if the present question had been deferred till other business of moment was prepared for discussion, the argument would have been entitled to some weight. At present no business was more important than this; and, if it were not so, the House would not have sanctioned its discussion. Mr. F. said he was not pleased at the unusual course proposed to be pursued in relation to this bill. He had often heard motions for the rejection of bills, but never knew one of them successful. Considering the history and character of this bill, it was entitled to the ordinary course of passing to a second and third reading. If, on a fair vote, there should be a majority against it, let there be an end of the question, not for this moment only, but during the war.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, said he did not rise to discuss this question, because he was satisfied the House was prepared to decide on it. He rose only to ask the gentleman to be kind enough to answer him one question. The faith of the nation is to be pledged for the money which must be obtained for the support of Government. Will not the pledge to be given in Washington be as valuable as any which could be given in Philadelphia? Will a removal increase the ability of a nation to meet the demands against it? It is not so. The Government is as competent to all such purposes here as it could be in any other city. Mr. N. appealed to the side of the House on which he sat. We, said he, are the majority; it is necessary for us to carry on the war with vigor. Your army now wants supplies: the moment when you ought to vote them, a bill is introduced calculated to set everything in motion, and we know not where and when Congress will meet again if it passes. If the public interest thus suffers, the responsibility is on us, and the people will look to us for accountability for all the evils which will result from such conduct.

Mr. STOCKTON, after desiring a call of the House, (which was not in order,) moved an adjournment, and called the yeas and nays thereon, in order to ascertain what members were absent.

H. OF R.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The yeas and nays having been so taken, there were for adjournment 40, against it 103, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Caldwell, Cilley, Condict, Cooper, Cox, Dana, Davenport, Ely, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hulbert, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Law, Lovett, Markell, Moffit, Moseley, Ormsby, John Reed, Sherwood, Skinner, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter.

NAYS—Messrs. Alston, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Boyd, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwin, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Oakley, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Post, Potter, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Ruggles, Sage, Schureman, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Shipherd, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Troup, Udree, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

Mr. STOCKTON then said, as eight or nine members appeared to be absent, he should move to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow.

On this motion Mr. RHEA required the previous question, which was not sanctioned by a sufficient number to take it.

Mr. MCKEE, of Kentucky, and Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, though both opposed to the bill, favored the postponement, from motives of liberality, and also from a dislike to what might by the absentees and others be deemed an unfair mode of legislation.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, and Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, opposed postponement, on the ground that the bill had been already sufficiently debated and ought by this time to be well understood, and also on the ground that there was now more than an usual number of members present, and probably more than there would be to-morrow.

Mr. GROSVENOR disclaimed any intention to impute improper motives to gentlemen by the expression that this was a surprise. He merely meant to say that such would be the effect of now taking the question.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, for the same reasons assigned by other gentlemen, was in favor of postponement. He had no doubt the final decision would be in favor of remaining here. He hoped the final question would be taken to-morrow. He was not willing any longer to suspend the people of the city by the eyelids. Even the savages destroy their victim the same day they begin to inflict the deathly tortures on him. He hoped the decision would then put eternally to rest the question of removal, and that this city, established by WASHINGTON, will never be broken up on the pretence that moneyed men would not lend their money here. Mr. W. said, if there were men who would act in this local manner, he did not desire their aid. The violation of public faith in even a temporary removal, under present circumstances, would injure the public credit infinitely more than a removal to any Northern city would strengthen it. Every man must see the situation of the country; every part of the Atlantic borders alike exposed to attack. But we should never have had a country to defend, if our ancestors had been appalled by danger—and danger so much greater than now, that living here was considered next to death, and was inflicted by the British Government as a punishment in commutation of that of death. He saw no inconvenience to Congress from sitting here. He liked the room in which the House sat better than the old hall, for every member might now be heard without extending his voice to that of a Stentor. Having been indisposed when this subject originally came before the House, he had thought it his duty to make these remarks. Gentlemen had said, if the Government went from this place there would be no inducement to the enemy to come here. The enemy had already gone from the Chesapeake, burnt their barrack on Tangiers island, indicating no intention to return at present. Although the enemy had been successful at this place, he had met the rubbers above, and he hoped he would again wherever he attempted to land; and would be universally beaten, if all Americans would now, as they ought, unite against the evil doers, and if every man in the country whose aid was worth having would, as he believed they would, aid in the prosecution of the war. He hoped the House would to-morrow relieve the citizens from the groundless fears of removal. He knew, he said, that this place was as secure as Philadelphia, and more so, and less assailable by the enemy. The enemy might occupy any point to which they would bend their whole force, and Philadelphia as easily as any other. They had much less inducement to come here than to go there. And why, said Mr. W., act the part contemplated by the bill? We have reprobated France and Great Britain for retaliating on us the injuries they received from each other—and shall we now imitate them, and retaliate on the people interested in the permanence of the Government here, for the injuries we and they have sustained from the enemy? It is a poor reason, because the enemy has destroyed the public property, that we should destroy the private. If the Government once removed hence, he was confident the same influence would prevent its return. Mr. RHEA said he was anxious to see this question at rest, and would, therefore, make a motion to supersede that now before the House, and give gentlemen as much procrastination as the most anxious for that course could desire. He, therefore, moved to postpone indefinitely (tantamount to a motion to reject) the bill. He had no other object in view than to get rid of the subject.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, then made a motion (superseding all the others) that the bill and all the motions should lie on the table; which motion was agreed to, yeas 94.

FRIDAY, October 14.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JAMES PARKER; and from Virginia, JAMES JOHNSON, appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, presented, for the third time, the memorial of Joseph Forrest, praying compensation for the detention, &c., by the Spanish Government, of a vessel chartered by him to the Government to convey flour to the people of Caraccas.—Referred.

Before any further business was done, a Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a number of documents; on opening which, the SPEAKER ordered strangers to be excluded the House. The doors remained closed until half past two o'clock. When they were again opened, it appeared that the Message embraced the instructions to our Ministers now in Europe, which the President announced his intention to communicate to Congress. They were, with the exception of a few passages deemed improper for publication, ordered to be printed.

The resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress in relation to the achievements of our military heroes in the Northern campaign of the present year, were read a third time, and passed unanimously.

Mr. EPES, of Virginia, said he had given notice that he would call up the tax report to day. The Committee, however, now expected a report from the Treasury, intimately connected with the subject, and had therefore instructed him to move to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Monday next; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, having called up the bill for a temporary removal of the Seat of Government—

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, assigned the lateness of the hour as a reason for moving an adjournment; which motion was adopted by a vote of 76 to 69; and, by adjournment, the subject was postponed until to-morrow.

SATURDAY, October 15.

Two other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, DANIEL WEBSTER; and from Connecticut, TIMOTHY PITKIN, appeared, and took their seats.

A new member, to wit: from Tennessee, NEWTON CANNON, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Felix Grundy, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in pursuance of a resolution of the 10th instant, statements of the returns of the direct tax and internal duties established by the several acts passed at the first session of the present Congress; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, from the Naval Committee, reported, without amendment, the resolution from the Senate, expressive of the sense of Congress relative to the victory of the Peacock over the Epervier; and it was referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the capture of this city by the enemy, after detailing their proceedings and their determination to bring it to as speedy a result as possible, moved for leave to sit on Tuesday next during the sitting of the House.—Granted.

Mr. BURWELL, of Virginia, laid upon the table a resolution instructing the Secretary of War to lay before the House a list of the officers of the Army, the places where they are stationed, distinguishing those engaged in recruiting, the number of men enlisted by these officers since the increase of bounty, and also what sums have been paid for that purpose. This resolution he did not call up for consideration to-day.

RETALIATING SYSTEM.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said it would be recollected the President, in his Message to Congress, at the last session, informed the House that the commanding General of the Canadas had selected a number of American prisoners of war, and sent them over to England in close confinement; and that, on that act, a system of retaliation had been commenced. It would be recollected also that, towards the close of the session, in consequence of a resolution passed by the Senate, a statement was given of the situation of the prisoners sent to England, and of those who, as hostages, had been confined on either side. Many publications since made in the public prints tended to show that the difficulty on this head had been settled—how, was not known. He deemed it all important that the public should know on what principles it had been settled. With that view, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House, if, in his opinion, it will not be inconsistent with the public welfare, all communications to or from the Government of England, or her officers or agents, not heretofore communicated, relative to the commencement and progress of any acts or system of retaliation founded upon, or produced by, the conduct of the British commander in Canada, "in selecting and sending to Great Britain, for trial as criminals, a number of individuals" taken prisoners of war from the American Army; also, any evidence he may have in his possession relative to the present conditions of such individuals.

The resolution was agreed to without debate or opposition, and a committee appointed to present the same to the President of the United States.

REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, called up for consideration the bill for the temporary removal of the

H. OF R.

Seat of Government from the City of Washington.

The question for rejection of the bill came first in order, and was stated from the Chair.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, rose, and stated the reasons why, though he should eventually vote against the bill, he should now vote against the rejection of it.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, replied to some of those reasons.

The question on the rejection of the bill was then put and negatived, by the following vote: For the rejection 76, against it, 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Crouch, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hasbrouck, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Lyle, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Shipperd, Skinner, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Tannehill, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter.

The bill was then read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole; and the House immediately resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill, it having been made the order of the day for to-day, in preference to Monday, by a majority of 86 to 65 votes.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to fill the blank for the place of removal with Philadelphia.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, moved to fill it with Georgetown.

Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. HOPKINS, of Kentucky, spoke against the insertion of Philadelphia, and Mr. PICKERING in favor of it.

The motion to insert Philadelphia was agreed to by a large majority; and the other blanks in the bill were filled up.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, then moved to insert the following section as an amendment to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That the annual sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and is hereby, appropriated, for the term of five years, to be applied, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the erection of suitable buildings within the city of Washington, for the accommodation of the President of the United States, the two Houses of Congress, and the several Departments of the Government, and that the same shall be paid annually to the order or orders of the President of the United States."

After much interesting debate this motion was agreed to, ayes 95.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill with the amendments, which were also concurred in by the House.

And the question was then put, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?" and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Crouch, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Fisk of New York, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hasbrouck, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Shipperd, Skinner, Smith of New York, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Stuart, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey—83.

[Absent on this vote.—Mr. Anderson, from indisposition; Messrs. Caperton, Ingham, Murfree, on leave; Messrs. Breckenridge, Calhoun, Davis of Massachusetts, Hale, Hopkins of New York, Howell, Kilbourn, Reed, Ridgely, Sheffield, Smith of Pennsylvania, Tallmadge, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wood, who have not attended at the present session.]

So the House determined that the bill should not be engrossed for a third reading; in other words, that it should be rejected.

MONDAY, October 17.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JOHN WILSON, and from Pennsylvania, ISAAC SMITH, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, presented the petition of Thomas Bruff, inventor of the method of manufacturing bullets and shot by experiment, stating the destruction of certain of his machinery proposed to have been connected with the steam-engine belonging to the late navy yard in this city, and praying that Congress will take his case into consideration.—Referred to a select committee.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Captain Alexander Sevier, praying remuneration for certain losses sustained in the public service, admitting the equity of his claim, but recommending a rejection of it on general legal principles.—Laid on the table.

The report is as follows :

That the petitioner is a Lieutenant of Marines in the service of the United States. On the 16th October, 1812, he was ordered to go from Washington City to the encampment near St. Augustine, in East Florida; and on his way to that place, near Ocoquan, his trunk was cut off the carriage in which he was, and robbed, as he states, of $200 in bank notes, and a check drawn in favor of the petitioner on the Bank of Petersburg for $200, and all his military clothes. It is stated in the petition that nearly one-half of the money belonged to the United States, having been advanced to him for public service. The petitioner asks to be remunerated for the money lost, and compensated for the apparel.

The petition was before the Committee of Claims at the last session of Congress; the committee were then of opinion that the petitioner was not entitled to relief; the present Committee of Claims accord with that opinion. In this case there is no satisfactory evidence of the loss of the property; in all cases the kind of evidence of that fact should be clear, positive, and uninterested. The committee, however, are of opinion that, taking the claim in its greatest latitude as related in the petition, sound policy requires that it should be rejected. When a public agent or officer receives money of the Government, he should keep it safe. There are but few cases in which he should be exonerated of his accountability; it is not believed this is a case of that description. They therefore recommend to the House the following resolution :

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, made a motion to print two thousand additional copies of the instructions to our Ministers to treat of peace in Europe.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, moved to amend the said motion so as to print these instructions entire, as received from the President, (that is, including the few passages not deemed proper for publication.)

The SPEAKER feeling a difficulty in receiving this motion under present circumstances—

Mr. GROSVENOR required the galleries to be cleared, and strangers were excluded accordingly.

The doors remained closed for two hours; when they were again opened, it appeared that the motion of Mr. GROSVENOR was rejected, and that of Mr. JACKSON was agreed to.

MR. JEFFERSON'S LIBRARY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. LEWIS in the Chair, on the resolution from the Senate authorizing the Library Committee to contract for the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, moved so to amend the resolution as to leave it open to the Library Committee to contract for the purchase of a library for the use of Congress.

On this motion considerable desultory debate took place; the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library being opposed by Messrs. OAKLEY, JOHN REED, and GROSVENOR, and advocated by Messrs. WRIGHT, SEYBERT, ROBERTSON, HAWKINS, and FORSYTH.

The objections to the purchase were generally its extent, the cost of the purchase, the nature of the selection, embracing too many works in foreign languages, some of too philosophical a character, and some otherwise objectionable. Of the first description, exception was taken to Voltaire's works, &c., and of the other to Callender's Prospect Before Us.

On the other hand, those who advocated the purchase proposed to be made, contended that so valuable a library, one so admirably calculated for the substratum of a great national library, was not to be obtained in the United States; and that, although there might be some works to which gentlemen might take exception, there were others of very opposite character; that this, besides, was no reason against the purchase, because in every library of value might be found some books to which exceptions would be taken, according to the feelings or prejudices of those who examined them.

Mr. OAKLEY's motion was negatived by the following vote—For the amendment 53, against it 87.

The Committee then rose and reported the resolution to the House, who took it up.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the resolution by limiting the power of the committee to the purchase of such parts of the library as they should deem suitable to the purpose.

[Mr. Jefferson, in his letter on the subject to Mr. SMITH, declines disposing of a part without the whole of his library.]

After some discussion, the question on this proposed amendment was decided by yeas and nays, by the following vote—For the amendment 47, against it 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Farrow, Geddes, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hanson, Jackson of Rhode Island, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Sherwood, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Stockton, Sturges, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

NAYS—Messrs. Mr. JOHN REED, of Massachusetts, then moved to amend the bill by limiting the price to be given for the whole of the library to twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, moved to lay the resolution, and the last motion together with it, on the table.—Negatived.

Mr. STANFORD's motion was then also negatived.

The yeas and nays having been demanded on Mr. REED's motion, before mentioned, after further discussion, the House adjourned without deciding the same.

TUESDAY, October 18.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, WILLIAM REED, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. MCKIM presented a petition of Daniel Renner and Nathaniel H. Heath, rope makers in the City of Washington, praying compensation for their wrought and unwrought materials, which were consumed by fire, by order of the enemy, on the 25th of August last, and which they were prevented from previously removing to a place of safety by the impressment of their vehicles of transportation into the public service.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, presented the memorial of a number of inhabitants of Alexandria, stating their indignant surprise at the slanders in circulation respecting that city, and praying a full and fair examination by Congress of their conduct during the late visit of the enemy to that town. The memorial was read.

Mr. LEWIS moved to refer the memorial to the committee of investigation appointed on the subject; which motion, after some desultory conversation, was agreed to.

JUDICIARY OF INDIANA TERRITORY.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a petition of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, praying that a law may be passed requiring the presence of two judges to hold courts; and that the duties of the courts of the United States for said Territory may be more clearly defined.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, the memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory humbly sheweth:

That, by a law of Congress, one of the judges, appointed by virtue of the ordinance for the government of this Territory, is authorized to hold a court. Thus, one of the judges being competent to hold a court, may decide a principle, or a point of law, at one term, and, at the next term, if the other two judges are present, they may decide the same principle or point of law different. Thus the decisions of the superior court, organized, we presume, by the General Government, finally to settle in uniformity the principles of law and fact, which may be brought before them by the suitor, may be, and frequently are, in a state of fluctuation; hence the rights of persons and property become insecure. There is another evil, growing out of the system, of one judge being competent to hold the superior court, or that court which forms the last resort of the suitor in any Government, and particularly in the Territory; for appeals are taken from all the courts of inferior jurisdiction in the Territory, to the court organized by the ordinance, which inferior courts are never constituted of less than two judges. Thus the suitor in the Territory is frequently driven to the necessity of appealing from the judgment of two men to that of one; but this dilemma only constitutes part of the solecism for the next superior court, as the other two judges may overturn the principles of the decision of their brother judge at the preceding term. Hence the want of uniformity in the decisions of the court of the last resort. Anger and warmth in the suitors, and a confusion in our system of jurisprudence, is the result.

Your memorialists beg leave further to suggest the propriety and necessity of defining, with more precision, the duties of the judges appointed by virtue of the ordinance for the government of the Territory. The ordinance says there shall be a court to consist of three judges, who shall have a common law jurisdiction. The same instrument points out the way a Legislature may be organized; but in no part does the ordinance expressly delegate to the Legislature the power of regulating when and where the superior courts are to be held, or the manner how they are to do business. This power, by a kind of common consent of the judges, the Legislature have assumed from the necessity of the case, as the ordinance creating the courts leaves it afloat, without identifying either the time when, the place where, or the manner how, this court is to exercise their jurisdiction. Again, it would be desirable that Congress would define the jurisdiction of the superior court. We presume that it is a sound rule for the construction of a constitution or a law, that it must be construed from the face of it, and not travel to the history of other times and other Governments in search of the meaning of our ordinance, or any act of Congress. We beg leave to suggest the propriety of pointing out, by law, what common law the ordinance refers to, whether the common law of England, or France, or of the Territory over which the ordinance is the constitution. If it should be determined that, by the expression of the ordinance, a common law jurisdiction should be located on the common law of England, it is essential to define to what extent of that common law the judges shall take cognizance; whether the whole extent of feudal and gothic customs of England; whether the customs, or unwritten law shall be taken with the statute law, and that to form the common law to govern the judges; or whether the unwritten and statute law is to be taken in contradistinction to the laws, customs, and rules of chancery; or whether it includes that law which is common to all. By Congress defining the powers of the court, and not leaving them at sea without compass or chart to exercise their power of judicial legislation, as circumstances may arise, or passion or interest dictate, by defining the powers of the Legislature and jurisdiction of the court, that collision and jarring which might arise between those two bodies would be harmonized.

Your memorialists, therefore, pray that you would repeal the law first herein alluded to, and make two of the judges hold the court, and define more specifically the duties of that court.

TREASURY REPORT.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, laid before the House the copy of a letter from the chairman of that committee to the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the subject of maintaining unimpaired the public credit, together with the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury thereto; which were read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House, to whom was referred the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on that part of the President's Message which relates to our finances.

The Letter and Report are as follows:

SIR: The Committee of Ways and Means have had under their consideration the support of public credit by a system of taxation more extended than the one heretofore adopted. They have determined to suspend proceeding on their report at present before the House of Representatives, with a view to afford you an opportunity of suggesting another, or such additional provisions as may be necessary to revive and maintain unimpaired the public credit.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN W. EPPES.

Hon. Mr. DALLAS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Oct. 17, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 14th instant, and, aware of the necessity for an early interposition of Congress on the subject to which it relates, I proceed, at the moment of entering upon the duties of office, to offer to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means, an answer on the several points of inquiry.

Contemplating the present state of the finances, it is obvious that a deficiency in the revenue, and a depreciation in the public credit, exist from causes which cannot in any degree be ascribed, either to the want of resources, or to the want of integrity in the nation. Different minds will conceive different opinions in relation to some of those causes; but it will be agreed on all sides, that the most operative have been the inadequacy of our system of taxation to form a foundation for public credit; and the absence even from that system of the means which are best adapted to anticipate, collect, and distribute the public revenue.

The wealth of the nation, in the value and products of its soil, in all the acquisitions of personal property, in all the varieties of industry, remains almost untouched by the hand of Government; for the national faith, and not the national wealth, has hitherto been the principal instrument of finance. It was reasonable, however, to expect, that a period must occur in the course of a protracted war, when confidence in the accumulating public engagements could only be secured by an active demonstration, both of the capacity and the disposition to perform them. In the present state of the Treasury, therefore, it is a just consolation to reflect that a prompt and resolute application of the resources of the country will effectually relieve from every pecuniary embarrassment and vindicate the fiscal honor of the Government.

But it would be vain to attempt to disguise, and it would be pernicious to palliate the difficulties which are now to be overcome. The exigencies of the Government require a supply of treasure for the prosecution of the war, beyond any amount which it would be politic, even if it were practicable, to raise by an immediate and constant imposition of taxes. There must, therefore, be a resort to credit, for a considerable portion of the supply. But the public credit is at this juncture so depressed, that no hope of adequate succor, on moderate terms, can safely rest upon it. Hence, it becomes the object first and last in every practical scheme of finance, to re-animate the confidence of the citizens; and to impress on the mind of every man, who, for the public account, renders services, furnishes supplies, or advances money, a conviction of the punctuality as well as of the security of the Government. It is not to be regarded, indeed, as the case of preserving a credit which has never been impaired, but rather as the case of rescuing from reproach a credit over which doubt and apprehension (not the less injurious perhaps because they are visionary) have cast an inauspicious shade. In the former case, the ordinary means of raising and appropriating the revenue, will always be sufficient; but in the latter case, no exertion can be competent to attain the object, which does not quiet, in every mind, every fear of future loss or disappointment in consequence of trusting to the pledges of the public faith.

The condition of the circulating medium of the country presents another copious source of mischief and embarrassment. The recent exportations of specie have considerably diminished the fund of gold and silver coin; and another considerable portion of that fund has been drawn by the timid and the wary, from the use of the community, into the private coffers of individuals. On the other hand, the multiplication of banks in the several States has so increased the quantity of paper currency, that it would be difficult to calculate its amount; and still more difficult to ascertain its value, with reference to the capital on which it has been issued. But the benefit of even this paper currency is in a great measure lost, as the suspension of payments in specie at most of the banks has suddenly broken the chain of accommodation, that previously extended the credit and the circulation of the notes which were emitted in one State into every State in the Union. It may in general be affirmed, therefore, that there exists at this time no adequate circulating medium common to the citizens of the United States. The moneyed transactions of private life are at a stand; and the fiscal operations of Government labor with extreme inconvenience. It is impossible that such a state of things should be long endured; but, let it be fairly added, that with legislative aid it is not necessary that the endurance should be long. Under favorable circumstance, and to a limited extent, an emission of Treasury notes would, probably, afford relief; but Treasury notes are an expensive and precarious substitute, either for coin or for bank notes, charged as they are with a growing interest, productive of no countervailing profit or emolument, and exposed to every breath of popular prejudice or alarm. The establishment of a national institution, operating upon credit combined with capital, and regulated by prudence and good faith, is, after all, the only efficient remedy for the disordered condition of our circulating medium. While accomplishing that object, too, there will be found, under the auspices of such an institution, a safe depository for the public treasure and a constant auxiliary to the public credit. But, whether the issues of a paper currency proceed from the National Treasury or from a National Bank, the acceptance of the paper in a course of payments and receipts must be forever optional with the citizens. The extremity of that day cannot be anticipated, when any honest and enlightened statesman will again venture upon the desperate expedient of a tender law.

From this painful, but necessary developement of existing evils, we pass, with hope and confidence, to a more specific consideration of the measures from which relief may be certainly and speedily derived. Remembering always, that the objects of the Government are to place the public credit upon a solid and durable foundation; to provide a revenue commensurate with the demands of a war expenditure, and to remove from the Treasury an immediate pressure, the following propositions are submitted to the committee, with every sentiment of deference and respect.

PROPOSITIONS.

I. It is proposed, that, during the war, and until the claims contemplated by the proposition are completely satisfied, or extinct, there shall be annually raised by taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, a fund for these purposes:

1. For the support of Government - - $1,500,000
2. For the principal and interest of the public debt, existing before the declaration of war, and payable according to the contract - - - - - 3,500,000
3. For the interest of the public debt, contracted, and to be contracted, by loans, or otherwise, from the commencement to the termination of the war, calculated upon an annual principal of seventy-two millions of dollars - - - - - 4,320,000
4. For the payment of Treasury notes, with the accruing interest - - - - - 7,400,000
5. For the payment of debentures to be issued (as is hereinafter proposed) for liquidated balances, due to individuals, on account of services or supplies, authorized by law, but either not embraced by a specific appropriation, or exceeding the sum appropriated - - - - -	$280,000

6. For a current addition to the sum raised by loan, or issues of Treasury notes, towards defraying the general expenses of the war - - - - -	2,000,000
7. For the gradual establishment of a sinking fund, to extinguish the debt incurred during the war - - - - -	500,000
8. For the contingent fund, to meet sudden and occasional demands upon the Treasury - - - - -	1,500,000
	<hr/> 21,000,000 <hr/>

II. It is proposed, that, during the war, and until the claims contemplated by the preceding proposition are completely satisfied, or other adequate funds shall be provided and substituted by law, there shall be annually raised, by the means here specified, the following sums:

1. By the customs (which cannot be safely estimated, during the war, at a higher product) - - - - -	$4,000,000
2. By the existing internal duties - - - - -	2,700,000
3. By the existing direct tax - - - - -	2,500,000
4. By the sales of public lands (which cannot be safely estimated, during the war, at a higher product) - - - - -	800,000
5. By an addition to the existing direct tax of one hundred per cent. - - - - -	2,850,000
6. By an addition of one hundred per cent. on the present auction duties - - - - -	150,000
7. By an addition of one hundred per cent. on the existing duties upon carriages - - - - -	200,000
8. By an addition of fifty per cent. on the existing duties on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise - - - - -	300,000
9. By an addition of one hundred per cent. on the existing rate of postage - - - - -	500,000
10. By the proceeds of the new duties specified in the annexed schedule, marked A, making the aggregate - - - - -	7,000,000
	<hr/> 21,000,000 <hr/>

III. It is proposed, that a National Bank shall be incorporated for a term of twenty years, to be established at Philadelphia, with a power to erect offices of discount and deposit elsewhere, upon the following principles:

1. That the capital of the bank shall be fifty millions of dollars, to be divided into one hundred thousand shares of five hundred dollars each. Three-fifths of the capital, being sixty thousand shares, amounting to thirty millions of dollars, to be subscribed by corporations, companies, or individuals; and two-fifths of the capital, being forty thousand shares, amounting to twenty millions of dollars, to be subscribed by the United States.

2. That the subscriptions of corporations, companies and individuals, shall be paid for in the following manner:

One-fifth part, or six millions, in gold or silver coin.

Four-fifth parts, or twenty-four millions, in gold or silver coin, or in six per cent. stock issued since the declaration of war, and Treasury notes, in the proportion of one-fifth Treasury notes and three-fifths in six per cent. stock.

3. That the subscriptions of corporations, companies, and individuals, shall be paid at the following periods :

20 dollars on each share, to be paid at the time of subscribing, in gold or silver coin	$1,200,000
40 dollars on each share, to be paid in gold or silver coin, one month after the subscription	2,400,000
40 dollars on each share, in two months after the subscription, in gold or silver coin	2,400,000
100 dollars, specie	6,000,000
100 dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin, or in six per cent. stock, or in Treasury notes, according to the preceding apportionment, to be paid at the time of subscribing	6,000,000
150 dollars on each share, to be paid in like manner, in two months after subscribing	9,000,000
150 dollars on each share, to be paid in like manner, in three months after subscribing	9,000,000
500	30,000,000

4. That the subscription of the United States shall be paid in six per cent. stock, at the same periods and in the same proportions as the payments of private subscriptions, in stock and Treasury notes.

5. That the United States may substitute six per cent. stock, for the amount of the Treasury notes subscribed by corporations, companies, and individuals, as the notes respectively become due and payable.

6. That the bank shall loan to the United States thirty millions, at an interest of six per cent., at such periods, and in such sums, as shall be found mutually convenient.

7. That no part of the public stock, constituting a portion of the capital of the bank, shall be sold during the war; nor at any subsequent time, for less than par; nor at any time to an amount exceeding one moiety, without the consent of Congress.

8. That provision shall be made for protecting the bank notes from forgery; for limiting the issue of bank notes; and for receiving them in all payments to the United States.

9. That the capital of the bank, its notes, deposits, dividends, or profits, (its real estate only excepted,) shall not be subject to taxation by the United States or by any individual State.

10. That no other bank shall be established by Congress, during the term for which the National Bank is incorporated.

11. That the National Bank shall be governed by fifteen directors, being resident citizens of the United States and stockholders. The President of the United States shall annually name five directors, and designate one of the five to be president of the bank. The other directors shall be annually chosen by the qualified stockholders, in person or by proxy, if resident within the United States, voting upon a scale graduated according to the number of shares which they respectively hold. The cashier and other officers of the bank to be appointed as is usual in similar institutions.

12. That the directors of the National Bank shall appoint seven persons, one of whom to preside, as the managers of each office of discount and deposit, and one person to be the cashier.

13. That the general powers, privileges, and regulations of the bank, shall be the same as are usual in similar institutions; but with this special provision, that the general accounts shall be subject to the inspection of the Secretary of the Treasury.

IV. It is proposed, that, after having thus provided for the punctual payment of the interest upon every denomination of public debt, for raising annually a portion of the annual expense, by taxes; for establishing a sinking fund, in relation to the new debt, as well as in relation to the old debt; and for securing to the public the efficient agency of a National Bank; the only remaining object of supply shall be accomplished by annual loans, and issues of Treasury notes, if, unexpectedly, such issues should continue to be necessary or expedient.

1. The amount of annual expenditure during the war, exceeding the sums provided for, does not admit of a prospective estimate beyond the year 1815; but for that year it may be estimated with sufficient accuracy for the general purposes of the present communication, at $28,000,000.

2. Then for the year 1815, an additional provision must be made, authorizing a loan and the issue of Treasury notes, to an equal amount, $28,000,000.

V. It is proposed that the accounts for authorized expenses being duly stated and settled, a certificate or debenture shall issue to the accountant specifying the balance; and that in all cases, where there has been no specific appropriation, or the claim exceeds the amount of the sum appropriated, the balance shall bear an interest of three per cent. until provision is made by law for paying the amount.

VI. And, finally, it is proposed to relieve the Treasury from an immediate pressure, upon the principles of the following statement :

1. The amount of demands upon the Treasury, exclusive of balances of appropriations for former years, unsatisfied, was stated in the report of the late Secretary of the Treasury of the 23d September, 1814, to be, on the 30th June	$27,576,391 19
2. The accounts of the third quarter of 1814 are not yet made up, and the precise sums paid during that quarter cannot now be ascertained, but they amount to nearly	8,400,000 00

Leaving to be paid in the fourth quarter of 1814

$19,176,391 19

3. This balance, payable during the fourth quarter of 1814, consists of the following items :

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses, about	$353,292 99
Military, about	8,792,688 00
Naval, about	2,382,010 97
Public debt, about	7,648,419 23
	$19,176,391 19

4. The existing provisions by law for the payment of this balance of $19,176,391 19, may be stated as follows :

The act of the 24th March, 1814, authorized a loan of $25,000,000 00

Treasury Report.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The act of the 4th March, 1814, authorized an issue of Treasury notes for - 5,000,000 00
 $30,000,000 00

Under these authorities, there have been borrowed, on loan, about $10,895,000 00

There have been sent to Europe, in 6 per cent. stock - 6,000,000 00

There has been issued, in Treasury notes - 3,504,000 00

20,399,000 00

$9,601,000 00

There remains, therefore, an unexecuted authority to borrow - 8,105,000 00

To issue Treasury notes 1,496,000 00

9,601,000 00

The demands of the fourth quarter being, then - - - $19,176,391 19

There may be applied to meet them the revenue accruing during the quarter, from all sources, about - 2,900,000 00

Also, paym'ts to be made on account of loans already contracted for, according to the authority above stated, about 2,500,000 00

5,400,000 00

Leaving a balance to be provided for, of - - - $13,776,391 19

By the authority remaining to borrow - $8,105,000 00

By the authority remaining to issue Treasury notes - 1,496,000 00

By an additional authority to be granted by law to borrow, and to issue Treasury notes - 4,175,391 19

$13,776,391 19

These estimates, however, it will be observed, are made with a view, simply, to the appropriations by law for the expenses of the year 1814, and do not embrace a provision to satisfy balances of appropriations made for the expenses of preceding years, which have not been called for at the Treasury. But, it will probably be deemed expedient to make such provision by extending the new authority to borrow from the above balance, to six millions. If the 6 per cent. stock which has been sent to Europe should be there disposed of, it will form an item in the estimates of the ensuing year.

As a portion of the amount to be provided during the present quarter consists of Treasury notes which will soon be due, it will be advisable to make them receivable in subscriptions to the loan.

It is proper to accompany these propositions with a few explanatory remarks:

1. The first proposition contemplates a permanent system; but the estimate of the particular items of claims and demands upon the public must be regarded as immediately applying to the year 1815. In every subsequent year there will necessarily be some variation; as, for instance, the item of interest on the old debt will annually sink, while the item of interest on the new debt will annually rise, during the continuance of the war.

The items for annually raising a portion of the public expenses by taxes, and for applying to the new debt a sinking fund—gradually increasing until it becomes commensurate to its object—are essential features in the plan suggested, with a view to the revival and maintenance of public credit. The extinguishment of the old debt is already in rapid operation by the wise precaution of a similar institution.

2. The second proposition will doubtless generate many and very various objections. The endeavor has been, however, to spread the general amount of the taxes over a wide surface with a hand as light and equal as is consistent with convenience in the process, and certainty in the result.

All the opportunities of observation, and all the means of information that have been possessed, leave no doubt upon the disposition of the people to contribute generously for relieving the necessities of their country; and it has been thought unworthy of that patriotic disposition to dwell upon scanty means of supply, or short lived expedients. Whenever the war shall be happily terminated in an honorable peace, and the Treasury shall be again replenished by the tributary streams of commerce, it will be at once a duty and a pleasure to recommend an alleviation, if not an entire exoneration of the burdens which necessarily fall at present upon the agriculture and manufacture of the nation.

3. In making a proposition for the establishment of a National Bank, I cannot be insensible to the high authority of the names which have appeared in opposition to that measure upon Constitutional grounds. It would be presumptuous to conjecture that the sentiments which actuated the opposition have passed away; and yet it would be denying to experience a great practical advantage, were we to suppose that a difference of times and circumstances would not produce a corresponding difference in the opinions of the wisest as well as of the purest men. But, in the present case, a change of private opinion is not material to the success of the proposition for establishing a National Bank. In the administration of human affairs, there must be a period when discussion shall cease and decision shall become absolute. A diversity of opinion may honorably survive the contest; but, upon the genuine principles of a representative Government, the opinion of the majority can alone be carried into action. The judge, who dissents from the majority of the bench, changes not his opinion, but performs his duty, when he enforces the judgment of the court, although it is contrary to his own convictions. An oath to support the Constitution and the laws, is not, therefore, an oath to support them under all circumstances, according to the opinion of the individual who takes it, but it is, emphatically, an oath to support them according to the interpretation of the legitimate authorities. For the erroneous decisions of a court of law, there is the redress of a censorial as well as of an appellate jurisdiction. Over an act founded upon an exposition of the Constitution, made by the Legislative department of the Government, but alleged to be incorrect, we have seen the Judicial department exercise remedial power. And even if all the departments, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, should concur in the exercise of a power, which is either thought to transcend the Constitutional trust, or to operate injuriously upon the community, the case is still within the reach of a competent control, through the medium of an amendment to the Constitution, upon the proposition, not only of Congress but of the several States. When, therefore, we have marked the existence of a National Bank for a period of twenty years, with all the sanctions of the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial authorities; when we have seen the dissolution of one institution, and heard a loud and continued call for the establishment of another; when, under these circumstances, neither Congress nor the several States have resorted to the power of amendment; can it be deemed a violation of the right of private opinion, to consider the constitutionality of a National Bank, as a question forever settled and at rest?

But, after all, I should not merit the confidence, which it will be my ambition to acquire, if I were to suppress the declaration of an opinion, that, in these times, the establishment of a National Bank will not only be useful in promoting the general welfare, but that it is necessary and proper for carrying into execution some of the most important powers Constitutionally vested in the Government.

Upon the principles and regulations of the National Bank, it may be sufficient to remark, that they will be best unfolded in the form of a bill, which shall be immediately prepared. A compound capital is suggested, with a design equally to accommodate the subscribers, and to aid the general measures, for the revival of public credit; but the proportions of specie and stock may be varied, if the scarcity of coin should render it expedient; yet not in so great a degree, as to prevent an early commencement of the money operations of the institution.

4. The estimates of receipts from established sources of revenue and from the proposed new duties, and the estimates of expenditures, on all the objects contemplated in the present communication, have been made upon a call so sudden, and upon materials so scattered, that it is not intended to claim a perfect reliance on their accuracy. They are, however, believed to be sufficiently accurate to illustrate and support the general plan, for the revival of the public credit, the establishment of a permanent system of revenue, and the removal of the immediate pressure on the Treasury.

Upon the whole, sir, I have freely and openly assumed the responsibility of the station in which I have the honor to be placed. But, conscious of the imperfections of the judgment that dictates the answer to the important inquiries of the Committee of Ways and Means, I derive the highest satisfaction from reflecting, that the honor and safety of the nation, for war, or for peace, depend on the wisdom, patriotism, and fortitude of Congress, during times which imperiously demand a display of those qualities in the exercise of the Legislative authority. I have the honor to be, &c.,

Schedule of new taxes referred to in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in which the taxes proposed in the report of the committee to the House of Representatives on the 10th instant, are principally adopted.

1. On spirits distilled from domestic or foreign materials 25 cents per gallon, computed on 24,000,000 gallons; provided the present tax on the capacity of the still should be continued. If it is thought best to lay the tax entirely on the liquor, then the tax on the capacity of the stills to be taken off, and 30 cents per gallon to be laid on the liquor. For the present estimate, it is taken at 25 cents per gallon - $6,000,000

2. On porter, ale, and strong beer, 2 cents per gallon, computed on 6,000,000 gallons - 120,000

3. On manufactured tobacco and snuff, averaged at 5 cents per pound, and computed on ten million pounds - 500,000

4. On leather of various kinds, averaged at three cents per pound, and computed on twenty million pounds - 600,000

5. On pig-iron at $1.50 per ton, computed on 300,000 tons - 450,000

6. On paper, at various rates, averaging 7 per cent. on the value of the article, computed on the annual manufacture of the value of 2,500,000 dollars - 175,000

7. On playing cards, at 25 cents per pack, computed on 400,000 packs - 100,000

8. On counsellors and attorneys at law, process in suits at law and equity, proceedings in admiralty, arbitrations and references, and other legal proceedings in the courts of the United States - 300,000

Mr. McKee, of Kentucky, rose to move that a greater than the usual number of this document be printed. From the reading of the report, he considered it an able one, and of a nature and interest abundantly more important to the American people than many documents in respect to which this course had been pursued. He wished, for his part, to be enabled to send to his constituents some copies; and therefore moved that five thousand copies thereof be printed.

This motion was agreed to—70 to 57.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY

The resolution authorizing the Library Committee of Congress to contract for the purchase of the library of Mr. Jefferson, was again resumed.

The amendment proposed yesterday, going to limit the sum to be given for the library to twenty-five thousand dollars, being yet under consideration.

The discussion which commenced yesterday was to-day continued with considerable vivacity.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. FORSYTH, and supported by Messrs OAKLEY of New York, PICKERING and JOHN REED of Massachusetts.

Mr. HULBERT from Massachusetts, it ought to be mentioned particularly, being his first essay in this House, in a very ingenious and handsome speech opposed, the amendment and advocated the purchase of the library.

The debate before its conclusion became rather too animated, and being checked by the Speaker, the question was permitted to be taken. There appeared to be on the yeas and nays, for the amendment 37, and against it 103, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Geddes, Grosvenor, Jackson of Rhode Island, Lewis, Macon, Markell, Moffit, Montgomery, Pearson, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Sherwood, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Stockton, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Chappell, Clark, Clopton, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lefferts, Lovett, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Moseley, Nelson, Newton, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Pickering, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Ruggles, Sage, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stanford, Strong, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Webster, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wright, and Yancey,

Mr. PICKERING moved an amendment, in substance the same as that moved yesterday by Mr. OAKLEY and negatived; the object of which was a selection of part of the library.

The amendment was negatived by yeas and nays—52 to 96.

An amendment was then adopted, on motion of Mr. OAKLEY, requiring the sanction of Congress to the agreement for the purchase of the library, before it should become binding. And, thus amended, the resolution was ordered to a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, October 19.

Another member to wit: from South Carolina, JOHN C. CALHOUN, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. HUMPHREYS presented several petitions from the inhabitants of the State of Tennessee, praying that measures may be taken by Congress to open a public road, crossing the Tennessee river, some where near the mouth of Duck river, and intersecting the road from Nashville to Natchez, below the Chickasaw Old Towns.—Referred to the Secretary of War.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the resolution of the 22d ultimo, directing an inquiry into the expediency of making further provisions for protecting the officers of the customs in the discharge of their duties, &c., and that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Ordered, That Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. COX be appointed of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the late capture of the city of Washington, by the enemy, in the places of Mr. STOCKTON and Mr. MILLER.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of Oliver Evans (the same as presented last session) for the extension of his patent for the improvements in the steam engine.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, in opposition to the wishes of Mr. INGERSOLL, who desired it to be referred to a select committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill further to extend the judicial system of the United States; which was twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, from the District Committee, reported a bill incorporating the Columbian Manufacturing Company of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, which was twice read and committed.

The joint resolution from the Senate, authorizing the joint Library Committee of Congress to contract for the purchase of the library of Mr. Jefferson, was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the petition of Alexander Sevier was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. BAYLIES, of Massachusetts, offered a motion similar to one adopted at his instance at the last session, out of which an act had grown, which had passed the House, but had not been definitively acted on in the Senate. The subject of the motion was, a further provision for compensating masters of vessels who bring home to the United States distressed and destitute American seamen; into the expediency of making which his motion instructed the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire. The motion was agreed to.

PEACOCK AND EPERVIER.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution from the Senate expressive of the sense of Congress relative to the victory of the Peacock over the Epervier. The resolution having been read—

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, (the chairman of the Naval Committee,) said it was not his intention to detain the Committee by any extended remarks on this subject. The action to which this resolution referred, more particularly, perhaps, than any which preceded it, demonstrated the superiority of American gunnery. To show this, Mr. P. quoted Captain Warrington's letter to the Secretary of the Navy announcing the victory; and inferred from it that no action had ever taken place, between vessels of anything like equal force, in which there had been so great a disparity of execution. He hoped the resolve would be unanimously adopted.

No objection being made or amendment proposed, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolve, which was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read and unanimously passed.

THURSDAY, October 20.

Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of John Crosby and others, on behalf of the inhabitants of Hamden, in the District of Maine, praying that the property recovered from the wreck of the United States' late ship Adams may be given to the said inhabitants, as a compensation for the losses sustained in consequence of the late capture of that place by the British forces.—Referred to the Secretary of the Navy.

The Senate having returned the resolutions from the House, in honor of Generals Brown, Scott, Gaines, Macomb, Ripley, Miller, and Porter. (with sundry amendments, (not affecting the object of the resolves,) the same were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A resolution was also received from the Senate, expressive of the sense of Congress relative to the capture of the British sloop Reindeer by the American sloop Wasp.—Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BURWELL, of Virginia, stated the reasons why he had not called up the motion he laid on the table the other day, calling for an account of the officers of the Army, state of the recruiting service, &c. The Committee of Military Affairs, he was informed, had the subject before them, and had received a document embracing all the information he desired, and which, when they were prepared to make a report, they would lay before the House.

The Military Committee asked and obtained leave to sit for a week during the sittings of the House.

Ordered, That Mr. PITKIN be appointed of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the late capture of the City of Washington by the enemy.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, said, the House having decided that Congress should not remove from this place, he thought it proper some steps should be immediately taken towards making a provision for the better accommodation of the different Departments of the Government. With this opinion he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of rebuilding or repairing the President's House, the Capitol, and Public Offices, and into the expenses necessary for that purpose; and whether the public interest or convenience would be promoted by any change or alteration of the sites of said buildings.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, said, he saw no reason for stirring the question of changing the sites of these buildings at present, and hoped the gentleman would expunge that part of his motion.

Mr. LEWIS said he was of the same opinion as his colleague in respect to the inexpediency of changing the sites of the public buildings; but, as some gentlemen in the House were, he knew, of a different opinion, he had thought it best to place the question in its broadest shape before the Committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, moved to refer the subject to a select committee, instead of the standing committee as proposed. It was a subject interesting to the whole United States, and the importance of which was not limited to the District only. He thought, therefore, it should be referred to a general committee. He took occasion to say, that the decision having been made on the question of removal, it ought to be final; and during this Congress, at least, he was not disposed to move it again. It was the duty of this Congress, he conceived, to proceed in preparing for the better accommodation of the Government here.

After some further conversation, Mr. G.'s amendment was agreed to—ayes 87; and Mr. LEWIS, Mr. KENT, of Maryland, Mr. HANSON, Mr. BOWEN, Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. SHARP, and Mr. CONDUCT, were appointed the said committee.

MILITARY MARINE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill requiring staff officers of the Army to comply with the requisitions of marine and naval officers in certain cases.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, explained the object of the bill, as indicated by the title, and quoted a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, recommending its adoption.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, expressed his wish, whilst this subject was under consideration, that the subject should be thoroughly arranged; and, with that view, that a provision should be incorporated, settling the relative rank of naval to land officers, when employed, as they frequently are, in the land service.

Mr. PLEASANTS assented to the propriety of such an amendment; and, with that object, moved that the Committee now rise, and obtain leave to sit again, to allow time to digest such an amendment as would be proper.

The Committee rose accordingly.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, suggested the expediency of a proper understanding on this head, between the Heads of the War and Navy Departments, and some reciprocal provision for mutual accommodation of land and naval officers, when out of their peculiar element, &c. Some amendment of this kind might well be incorporated when the bill should again come under consideration.

Leave was given to the Committee of the Whole to sit again on said bill.

RELIEF OF COMMODORE BARNEY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of the officers, petty officers, and seamen, under the command of Commodore Joshua Barney.

Mr. PLEASANTS stated the object of this bill to be, to compensate the officers and men of the flotilla, for the loss of their clothes sustained by the sudden destruction of the flotilla to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy. Mr. P. adverted also to their good conduct in the defence of this place, and on every other occasion, and to the peculiar hardships of their service, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, after paying a just tribute to the uniform good conduct of these men, moved to insert three instead of two months pay. This motion was, after discussion, negatived.

Mr. POST, of New York, moved to amend the bill, by striking out so much of the bill as assigns the loss of clothes and bedding by the blowing up of the flotilla, as a reason for the grant proposed, and inserting, in lieu thereof, "for their bravery in the battle of Bladensburg, on the 24th of August last." This motion was negatived by a large majority.

The Committee rose and reported the bill. On the question, whether the bill should be ordered to a third reading—

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, said, he had no wish to defeat the passage of the bill, but he thought it would be proper to suspend its passage for the present, because it was not sufficiently guarded in its provisions. He wished it to lie over also till the Committee of Investigation should report on this and other subjects. He was inclined to believe, from all he had heard, that the destruction of that flotilla was a very unnecessary act, and that it might all have been saved, except the gunboats, by carrying it a proper distance up the river. He moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill to the first Monday in December next.

This motion was also negatived—ayes 38.

Mr. WILLIAM REED, of Massachusetts, renewed the motion to insert, instead of the reason now assigned for this grant, the words, "in reward for the extraordinary bravery displayed by them in the battle of Bladensburg, on the 24th August."

This motion Mr. R. afterwards modified, on the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, so as to read, "in consideration of their gallantry and good conduct, and of the unusual hardship of their service."

On these several motions considerable debate took place, in which Messrs. WRIGHT, PLEASANTS, POST, STUART, GOLDSBOROUGH, KING, and REED, of Massachusetts, LOWNDES, of South Carolina, JACKSON, of Virginia, PICKERING, and TAYLOR, of New York, took part.

The objection to the bill as it now stood was, that it would afford an injurious precedent for all such cases of loss of clothing by seamen, which frequently occurred, whilst all appeared to agree that these men, by their general good conduct, particularly in the battle of Bladensburg, merited the notice of Government. It was said by General Stuart that the men had sufficient notice to have saved their clothing; and the enemy's force was not nearer than a day's march, when orders were given to blow up the flotilla. The same gentleman also took occasion to observe, that he believed if the flotilla had never been brought up the Patuxent, this place would never have been attacked, and the public buildings would still have been standing. It was this flotilla which had caused the recent invasion of Maryland.

It was said, on the other hand, that giving pecuniary rewards for bravery, as was proposed to be done in this case by those who opposed the bill as it stood, would afford a precedent, if pursued, which would soon empty the Treasury. The case of these men, it was said, was far different from ordinary cases of loss of clothing. They had, since the 22d of August, the day the flotilla was destroyed, been engaged in the most arduous service which could be found, and had to sleep on the bare ground, without blankets, and scarcely clothes to their backs, having lost all they had, &c. As to the flotilla causing the invasion of Maryland, Mr. PLEASANTS said, they had had no flotilla in the waters of Virginia, and yet they had suffered there quite as much from the depredations of the enemy as they had in Maryland, &c.

Before the question on amendment was taken, a motion was made by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, to lay the bill on the table. There were for the motion 66, against it 59.

So the bill was laid on the table.

FRIDAY, October 21.

On motion of Mr. YANCEY, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws of the United States, as to the effect which a judgment of record of one State shall have when offered in evidence in a suit in another State; and that they have permission to report by bill or otherwise.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, "further to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the process thereon to the General Land Office;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, presented the petition of the Union Bank of Georgetown, and of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, praying for charters; and of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, praying for an extension of its charter.—Referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITION OF JOSEPH FORREST.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Joseph Forrest, which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next. The report is as follows:

That in the month of May, 1812, the petitioner, by his agent, chartered to the United States his schooner, called the William Yeaton, to take a cargo of provisions from New York to the port of Lagaira, in South America. The contract, according to the covenants of the charter-party, was, that the petitioner should keep the vessel sound, tight, and strong; to be well fitted and provided with the necessary and convenient things for such a schooner; to find the necessary men for the voyage; to employ and pay the officers and men for the same; and to defray all other expenses attending the voyage; to load the said schooner by the 26th of

OCTOBER, 1814.

Petition of Joseph Forrest.

H. OF R.

May, 1812, and then to proceed to Laguira with all convenient and practicable expedition, where he was to discharge the cargo with convenient despatch. In consideration of such service, the United States covenanted with the petitioner to pay him for the cargo at the rate of one dollar and fifty cents for every barrel of flour, seventy-five cents for every half barrel of flour, and forty cents for every bushel of corn, as the full freight and compensation for the voyage. The schooner arrived at the port of Laguira on the first day of July, 1812; gave notice to the agent of the United States of her arrival; and, between the 14th of that month and the 1st of August following, about two-thirds of the cargo was received. On that day a Spanish force entered Laguira, and seized the vessel with about one-third of the cargo on board; that part, however, was then received and deposited by the agent of the United States; but the schooner was forcibly taken from the officer and crew, carried by her captors into Porto Cabello, and condemned by the Spanish authorities, upon the ground that the cargo was intended by the Government of the United States to furnish the inhabitants of Venezuela with provisions, at a time when they were in a state of insurrection. It appears also to the committee, by a letter from the petitioner, addressed to a former chairman of the Committee of Claims, that the vessel remained in possession of the captors until about the 1st of October, when, by the interposition and friendship of Don Onis, she was restored to her captain and crew; she was then sold by the captain at auction, to defray the expenses of seizure, delay, and condemnation. The petitioner asks of Congress compensation for the loss of the vessel and such damages as he has sustained.

This case presents some features of hardship to the owner, but it is believed no legal obligation on the United States. If the owner has sustained damages by a breach of the contract on the part of the United States or its agent at Laguira, then it is conceded he is entitled to a compensation equivalent to the injury; but if the damages which have accrued to him were the consequence of an abuse of power in the Spanish authorities, or an illegal and hostile act of that Government, it is believed the United States are not responsible to the owner.

The committee know of no rule by which more justice can be done to the parties than that afforded by the terms of the contract. They are of opinion that, from the foregoing facts, these terms create no legal obligation on the United States to pay for the vessel. They, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

WASHINGTON, June 16, 1813.

SIR: In conformity to the request which, as chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, you did me the honor to express to me this morning, relative to the vessels sent out with the donation voted by act of Congress in May, 1813, for the relief of the inhabitants of Venezuela, I take the liberty to state that the said vessels, in number six, say two from the respective ports of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, arrived in the port of Laguira in the month of June, 1812. Of these vessels, addressed to me as Consul for the United States, one only, the Independence of Baltimore, brought with her a regular charter-party; their freights being paid in advance before their departure from America, and no time, except in this one instance, being stipulated as to the discharge of the vessels. The Independence arrived on the 9th June, was immediately unloaded and reloaded for account of various merchants of Baltimore. She was cleared by the custom-house for Baltimore on the 17th July, 1812, but detained by a general embargo, laid by order of Miranda, then at the head of the revolutionary Government. The arrival of the other vessels was delayed until the 27th and 28th of June. Every exertion was used for their prompt unloading, but, owing to the scarcity of lighters, the deranged state of the town from the misfortune of the 26th March, and finally the impress of nearly all the laborers for the war service, the discharging of all the vessels could not be completed before the country came again under the Spanish yoke, in the beginning of August, inasmuch that the Active Trader and Cumberland of Philadelphia, and Mary of New York, had part of their outward cargoes on board at this period. The ship Mary and Eliza of Baltimore, and William Yeaton from New York, were nearly loaded with return cargoes on freight for this country.

I beg leave, therefore, to repel the charge made against me, as agent for the United States, of want of due diligence on my part; it being impossible for any human activity, under similar circumstances, to do more for the prompt unloading of the vessels in question than was done by me.

For the subsequent events relative to the vessels, their libelling and condemnation by the Spanish authority at Puerto Cabello, and their final restitution on appeal to Caraccas, I beg leave to refer you to the protests made in due form before me in Laguira, and which, no doubt, will accompany the documents on which the claimants found their demand for compensation from the Congress of the United States.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT K. LOWRY.

PHILADELPHIA, February 14, 1814.

I consider it a general principle of maritime law, that, as the owner of a vessel who receives goods on freight is bound to use due diligence to convey them to the port of destination, and deliver them to order, so the consignee is bound to use due diligence in receiving those goods, and facilitating the vessel's discharge.

Each party is answerable to the other for any injury that may arise from neglect or delay, unless satisfactory reasons for delay can be assigned. When a vessel is to deliver an outward, and take in a return cargo, it is customary to have a charter-party executed, in which the number of lay-days, &c., are stipulated; but when the contract is simply to deliver an outward cargo, such charter-parties are not necessary, and I believe not usual.

The general rules of law are then to be resorted to. I took the liberty of stating in my letter to Mr. Eppes, that if the agreement for carrying provisions to Laguira had been made between Mr. Clement and an individual, and the same circumstances of delay in regard to receiving the goods which are imputed to Mr. Lowry had taken place on the part of the agent of the freighter, Mr. Clement could have obtained judicial relief.

H. OF R.

The Ways and Means.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The foregoing remarks explain the principles on which this opinion is founded.

One of Mr. Clement's vessels arrived at Laguira on the 27th, and the other on the 30th of June. Three or four days would have been sufficient for the discharge of the whole of the cargoes—allow a week; on the 7th of July they ought to have been discharged; but neither of them was discharged till the 8th or 9th of August.

Whatever damage happened after the expiration of a reasonable time, and which, in its nature, was fairly imputable to delay, would be recoverable at law of the freighter, who would be left to his remedy against his agent.

Mr. Lowry, it is understood, denies the charge against him. It is a fact to be inquired into, but it is difficult to conceive why the captains, whose duties and whose habits are to lose no time in discharging their outward cargoes and returning, should have trifled with their owners' interests in the extraordinary manner they must have done, by consuming four or five weeks in doing what might, as they themselves acknowledge, have been accomplished in one.

But Mr. Clement's right to compensation does not, I think, rest on this ground only.

His vessels were in the service of the nation; he sailed in a single degree under the protection of the United States; he, therefore, was bound to presume that the papers he received from them were competent to protect him.

It was not for him to cast about for other passports or documents of any kind than what they furnished him with; and, under these circumstances, the United States must be considered as guarantying his admission and his safety in the Spanish ports.

It must also be considered as an engagement, on the part of the United States, that his mission should not, from its nature, expose him to any extraordinary damage. If this had been apprehended, he would of course have claimed, and been considered entitled to, a larger compensation for the risk than the usual amount of freight.

Now the seizure and condemnation which, after the first detentions, produced the additional delay and eventual loss are founded on the nature of his errand and the alleged defect of the proper papers.

Mr. Clement's conduct throughout appears, and is admitted by the agents for the United States, both here and at Laguira, to have been unblameable.

His vessels took in their respective cargoes here with unexceeded promptness, and delivered them at Laguira in perfect order. Nothing was done by him or his captains that could in any manner produce any injury or disadvantage to the voyage.

I cannot but think his claim on the justice of his country a very strong one.

W. RAWLE.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House, on motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the subsequent letter from Mr. Secretary Dallas.

Mr. E. stated that, since the receipt of the Secretary's letter, the committee had revised their report, and had determined to recommend its modification, so as to correspond, in so far as they believed consistent with the public good, with the last report from the Treasury Department. The report of the committee having been read over, the first resolution having been read, which proposes to continue the direct tax, and to increase the same fifty per cent.

Mr. E., after some introductory remarks, moved to amend the report in conformity to the Secretary of the Treasury's report, so as to make the addition one hundred instead of fifty per cent.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, said that he rose for the purpose of moving to amend the amendment which had been offered to the resolution under consideration by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The resolution, as originally reported by that committee, proposed to continue the existing direct tax and to add fifty per cent. to the amount. The Secretary of the Treasury had recommended an increase of one hundred per cent., and, in pursuance of that recommendation, the committee had directed their chairman to make the motion he had just submitted; the effect of which, if successful, would be to raise by the direct tax six millions of dollars. His object, Mr. O. said, was to go still further, and to raise from that source of revenue seven millions and a half. As he was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, it might be proper for him here to state, lest he should be considered as opposing the report of the committee, to which he might be presumed to have agreed—that they were much divided in opinion as to the point now in question, as well as to several others embraced in the report.

The honorable chairman, Mr. O. said, had correctly stated that the plan of finance adopted at the commencement of the war, was, to raise by customs, and direct and indirect taxes, a sum sufficient to defray the expenses of the Peace Establishment, and to pay the interest of the old debt, together with the interest on such new debt as might be incurred from year to year by the war, and to rely upon loans to meet all the expenditures of the war. This, Mr. O. presumed, was to be considered as the war plan of finance, which the Administration had deemed competent to carry the country safely through the contest. It was to the errors and insufficiency of this plan that the present financial embarrassments of the Government were fairly to be attributed. The principal feature and great defect of the plan was, that reliance was placed, to use the language of the Secretary of the Treasury, on "the national faith and not the national wealth." It was, simply, the plan of always borrowing and never paying; a plan which would necessarily lead to bankruptcy either in an individual or a nation. Its authors seemed to have forgotten or disregarded the first rudiments in any correct system of finance, which would have taught them never to contract a debt without creating a revenue sufficient to pay the interest and gradually discharge the principal.

Gentlemen had been warned of the inadequacy of this plan of finance in the outset; they had been told that there was nothing miraculous in this thing called "public faith;" that it was no better and frequently not as good as the faith of an individual; and that the public creditor would look not only to the honesty of the Government, but to the means provided by it to meet its engagements; indeed, a pledge of the public faith by law for the redemption of a debt, appeared to him entirely superfluous; inasmuch as it was always pledged by the very act of incurring the debt. Gentlemen had been frequently urged to resort to specific pledges of parts of the existing revenue to secure the payments of the loans, with a view to obtain them on more favorable terms. They had, however, considered such pledges unimportant, and had gone on relying upon public credit alone, without taking any steps to support it, until the nation was literally bankrupt. They had, indeed, succeeded in making some loans at first on very unfavorable terms; but their system had at length entirely exploded. It was admitted that their last attempt had failed, notwithstanding the Government had been prepared to accept terms of the most extravagant and ruinous character. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury showed that there was a deficit in the ways and means provided for the present year of near fourteen millions of dollars. This sum it was necessary to raise immediately to meet the expenditures of the present quarter of the year. In this deficit was not included the vast amount of unascertained debt which had arisen from expenditures not comprised in the general estimate, and for which no specific appropriations had been made by law; but which, however, had as fair a claim on the Government for immediate payment as any other. He alluded particularly to the expenses which had attended the employment of the vast bodies of militia which had been called into the public service, and which the Government did not now possess funds to meet.

The Ways and Means.

The correctness of the summary view he had taken of the defects in the plan of finance, he believed could not be questioned. The consequences of these defects would be strongly exemplified by a reference to the manner in which the last loans had been negotiated. He had made a statement, which he would submit to the Committee, and which he believed substantially correct, intended to show in a succinct point of light the extent of the sacrifice which the Government had been compelled to make in order to procure the partial supplies which these loans had afforded. By the act of the 24th of March, 1814, a loan of $25,000,000 was authorized. Proposals for a part of that loan, being $10,000,000, were invited by the Treasury on the second day of May. Various proposals were made, and the Government finally contracted for the sum of $9,795,056, at the rate of $100 in stock, bearing an interest of six per cent. for eighty-eight dollars in money. But what particularly deserved notice in this contract was the condition insisted on by the contractors and acceded to by the Government, that if any part of the $25,000,000 loan should be made by the Treasury, on terms more favorable to the lender, the same should be extended to that contract—a condition the most injurious to the Government that could have been devised—inasmuch as it made it the interest of the contractors to depress rather than to sustain the price of the public stocks.

On the 22d of August proposals were again invited for $6,000,000, as a part of the loan authorized by the act of the 24th of March; and Government, on those proposals, contracted for the sum of $2,930,300, being all it could obtain at the rate of one hundred dollars in stock, at an interest of six per cent. for eighty dollars in money. The consequence was a sacrifice by the Government of twenty per cent., not only on the amount thus contracted for, but on the whole of the contract for the $9,795,056; the holders of which, by virtue of the condition annexed to their contract, had a right to demand of the Government a premium of eight per cent. in addition to the twelve per cent. they had already received. The following statement would give a view of the extent of the loss which the Government had suffered in the negotiation of these loans.

Total loss	-	-	2,576,883

Amount of stock to be created by Government to raise the sum contracted for $15,302,239

It would be seen, Mr. O. said, from this statement, that the Treasury, in order to raise the sum of $12,725,356, had been obliged to create stock to the amount of $15,302,237, and had thus paid a premium to the lenders of $2,576,883, or upwards of one-fifth of the whole amount.

Another view of the second contract might be presented which would be still more striking. As the eight per cent. on the sum of $9,595,056 were lost solely in consequence of that contract, the whole ought to be placed to its account.

The statement of the second contract would then stand thus:

Amount contracted for	-	-	$2,930,300
Loss, 20 per cent. on that sum	-	-	$586,060
Eight per cent. on the sum of $9,795,056	-	-	783,604

Total loss on second contract	-	-	1,376,990

Amount of stock to be created by the second contract - - - - $4,307,290

It would thus appear that the premium in fact paid by the Government for the sum of $2,930,300, was $1,376,990, or very nearly fifty per cent. When, Mr. O. said, the Treasury was reduced to the necessity of negotiating loans on terms like these, it required no argument to prove that the finances and credit of the nation were in a state of utter ruin.

Mr. O. had stated the one-fourth of one per cent. on the amount of the contracts as one item of the loss. That was allowed by the law authorizing the loan as a commission to any person who should collect subscriptions from others, and was not intended to be given on any sum which the contractor might offer for his own benefit. It would be seen, by a reference to the report of the late Secretary of the Treasury, that more than one-half of the first contract for $9,795,056 was taken by an individual, for anything that appeared, on his own account; yet the commission had been allowed to him, and indeed, had been expressly stipulated for in his written proposals, which could not have been necessary, had he been entitled to it by the terms of the law. He could not, therefore, help thinking, Mr. O. said, that in this instance, it had been paid contrary to the spirit, and indeed, to the plain letter of the law.

Mr. O. said, he had entered into these details for the purpose of showing to the Committee that a total and immediate change in the system of finance hitherto pursued by the Administration was absolutely necessary. It was the first step towards that reform in the management of the finances which could alone restore and maintain the public credit. Gentlemen must resort now to what it was their duty long ago to have adopted—a system of direct and internal taxes, sufficiently extended, to form the basis of loans. To make that basis firm, the proceeds of the taxes must be adequate, not only to pay the interest, but to constitute a certain fund for the reimbursement of the principal—and must be specially pledged to the public creditor by law. Had this system been pursued from the beginning, a much smaller amount of taxes would have been necessary to support public credit, than are now demanded to restore it. In proportion, as the state of the finances was desperate, the more vigorous must be the remedy applied for their relief.

In any such system of revenue, Mr. O. said, the direct tax was undoubtedly a principal feature. He had always thought that, in all countries, land was the legitimate and proper object of taxation, whenever the public exigencies required it. But in this country there were some reasons which, in his judgment, rendered it peculiarly so. By the Constitution, direct taxes were apportioned among the several States, according to their representation in that House. The representation of the States holding slaves, it was well known, was greatly increased by that species of population. It was therefore provided by the Constitution, that they should pay a greater proportion of every direct tax, as an equivalent for the undue weight which they thus acquired in the Government. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had said, that the direct tax was unequal, and therefore objectionable; being apportioned among the States according to population, and not according to wealth. In any other state of things than that presented by the Constitution, the remark would be correct. The framers of that instrument intended that it should be unequal, and that it should enter as a principal part into every system of extraordinary, if not ordinary taxation, to which the country might be compelled to resort.

He was, therefore, Mr. O. said, in favor of continuing the direct tax, and of increasing it beyond the amount proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. Indeed, so just in a political point of view was it, and so much in conformity with the spirit of the Constitution, that he thought that much the greater part of the revenue now required ought to be raised by that tax alone. That it could be extended greatly beyond the amount proposed, did not admit of a doubt. If gentlemen would advert to the document from the Treasury laid on their tables that morning they would find, if they would make the necessary calculations, that in those States where the valuation of houses, lands, and slaves, had been made in pursuance of the existing law, the aggregate proportion of the tax to the amount of the valuation was extremely small. In New Hampshire it was about 26 cents in the 100 dollars—in Massachusetts about 33—in Vermont about 30—in Rhode Island about 16—in Connecticut 13—in New York 28—Delaware 23—Maryland 14—North Carolina 20—and Tennessee about 28. Thus in no case was the present direct tax as high as one-third of one per cent. on the amount of valuation, and in some it was no more than about one-eighth of one per cent. And the average rate of the tax in all the States he had named, was not more than one-fifth of one per cent. When it was considered that the valuation was in fact, in all cases, much below the real intrinsic worth of the property, it must be apparent that the present tax could be greatly increased without becoming burdensome.

He was in favor of an increase of the direct tax, Mr. O. said, for another reason. It operated, in consequence of the provisions of the Constitution, unequally on the slaveholding States, or in other words, generally speaking, on the Southern and Western States. This inequality was necessary to countervail the unequal operation of the internal duties on the Northern and Eastern States. The document before alluded to, if examined, in reference to that subject, would present some striking results. He would call the attention of gentlemen to the last page of the document, which contained the "aggregate amounts of internal duties ascertained on the 10th of October, 1814, to have been received in each State or Territory." Although that aggregate did not, for very evident reasons, show accurately the amount of internal duties actually accrued in each State, yet, when it was considered that the collectors were obliged by law to make their returns at very short periods, the amount known at the Treasury to have been received at any given time, was tolerable evidence of the amount accrued up to that time. At all events, it was sufficiently exact for the general purposes of his argument.

He had made some calculations, Mr. O. said, while in his seat that morning, from the data offered by that document, which he would submit to the Committee. Some allowance ought to be made in these calculations on account of the difference before alluded to, between the duties received and the duties accrued; but he believed, the general result would not, in any case, be materially varied. The whole amount of internal duties ascertained to have been received on the 10th of October, 1814, was $1,491,385. Of this amount, the States east of the river Delaware had paid $765,200; and States south and west of that, including all the Territories, and the District of Columbia, had paid $726,185, while the former had seventy-four Representatives in that House, and the latter one hundred and eight. Including Pennsylvania in the Eastern division, it would appear that that division, with ninety-four Representatives, had paid $1,045,183, while the South and West with eighty-five Representatives paid only $446,202. The State of Rhode Island, with two Representatives, had paid more than Tennessee with six, and as much nearly as Kentucky with ten, or Ohio with six. Connecticut, with seven Representatives, had paid $58,877, while Kentucky and Ohio, with sixteen Representatives, had paid only about $65,000. New Jersey with six Representatives had paid $54,202, and Kentucky with ten, $32,935. The State of New York alone had paid $303,694, while all the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Delaware, and Louisiana, had paid only about $260,000; while the latter had fifty-three Representatives in that House, and sixty-nine votes in the choice of a President of the United States, while the former had twenty-seven Representatives, and twenty-nine votes for President. Under the Stamp Act alone, there had accrued in Massachusetts during the two first quarters of the year, $14,281, and in the States of Delaware, North Carolina, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Georgia, there had accrued during the same period but $19,435. In Rhode Island, with two Representatives, there had accrued under the same act, and for the same time, more revenue, than in North Carolina, with thirteen Representatives—and gentlemen would find the same inequality running throughout the whole system. It was most evident, therefore, that the political power and influence of the Northern and Eastern States, when compared with the other parts of the Union, held no proportion to the share which they bore of the public burdens.

As gentlemen from the South and West had always contended that the duty on domestic distilled spirits pressed very unequally on that part of the Union, his attention, Mr. O. said, had been drawn particularly to that subject. He found on examination, that in the States east of the Delaware, there had accrued during the first two quarters of the year from the duty on licenses to distillers $317,795, and in the States south and west of that river $439,602; and if Pennsylvania were added to the eastern division, the States south and west would pay on that article only $167,822, while the East would pay $589,575. Connecticut, as far as the product could be estimated by the amount of the tax, made more domestic spirits than Maryland, Ohio, South Carolina, or Georgia, and about as much as either Tennessee or Kentucky; and the State of New York as much as Delaware, Maryland, North and South Carolina, Ohio, and Georgia together. It would appear, then, that the idea that the tax on domestic spirits bore unequally on the Western and Southern country was entirely erroneous—the reverse was the truth.

Such a system of internal duties, Mr. O. said, he considered both unjust and impolitic; unjust, because it imposed the public burdens on one section of the Union, while the political power resided in another; and impolitic, as it must necessarily tend to weaken the attachments of the people to the Government. The States ought not to contribute to the support of Government in proportion to wealth, while power was enjoyed according to numbers. He was, for these reasons, Mr. O. said, clearly of opinion, that the direct tax ought to be increased above, and the system of internal duties reduced below the amount recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. From the effect of this general principle, however, he was willing to except the article of domestic spirits; although the duty on that article, like all other internal duties, operated unequally on the East and North, he thought it a proper subject of taxation. The use of it in most cases was a vice—in some a luxury, and in very few a necessary. He wished to increase the duty to the amount recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury; and when the proper period arrived, he would move, if no other gentlemen did it, to amend the report of the Committee of Ways and Means to that effect. The Chairman of the committee had thought that a duty of thirty cents on the gallon would operate as a prohibition of the manufacture of the article. When, however, it was recollected that imported spirits bore an average duty of fifty-eight cents on the gallon, and that the importation was almost entirely cut off, he could not doubt but that domestic spirits would easily bear the proposed tax without materially lessening the consumption.

There were still other reasons, Mr. O. said, which induced him to be in favor of an increase of the direct tax, and to give it a preference over any system of internal duties. It was a certain tax in its product. The Government could not be deceived in the amount they calculated to derive from it. When pledged to the public creditor, he would be under no apprehension that the revenue would fail him. The confidence inspired by any system of revenue was always in proportion to the certainty of its proceeds. The amount of the proceeds of this tax could not be materially varied by any change in the habits, customs, or business of the people, by which the internal duties were always more or less affected. It was not only a certain tax, but it was easily collected. It employed no excise officers to harass the people. The assessments it required to be made were in practice under the State laws in almost every State. In addition to this, the mode of collecting it was an effectual security against fraud on the part of the collector. He could not embezzle any part of the tax without detection. This was a consideration of no small importance, when it was considered that the Government must necessarily often make improper appointments to the office of collector, and when it was sometimes the case, that considerations entered into the appointment, other than those of the integrity and capacity of the candidate.

He was further anxious, Mr. O. said, for an increase of the direct tax, as gentlemen would perceive, if they agreed to raise an additional million and a half from this source, they would be able to dispense with the taxes on leather, candles, iron, saddles, bridles, and some other articles of real necessity, which had been placed on the list of new taxes. The tax on leather was particularly objectionable. It was proposed to tax it, not only in the first stage of the manufacture, but in harness, boots, saddles, and bridles; in almost every shape it could assume. The tax on iron was in truth a tax on the farmer and mechanic, into whose business it necessarily entered to a great degree. The farmer surely would prefer paying his tax in a gross sum, assessed upon his farm, when he could know the amount demanded of him, than to have it drawn from him indirectly, and to an extent that he could not well estimate, in duties on all the leather, and iron, and saddles, and bridles, and hats, and tobacco, and nails, which he might find it necessary to purchase.

Mr. O. said he was utterly opposed to this system of drawing the supplies from so many sources, and running into all this detail of indirect taxation. It was better to lay hold of a few prominent objects and raise the money from them. Many of the proposed internal duties could not be collected at all by means of an excise, which was always odious and oppressive to the spirit of every free people. These smaller items, therefore, had better be omitted. They were not very productive, but still were very vexatious and harassing. It was better not to resort to them at all until other resources were exhausted. They might be reserved, at all events, until next year; when, if the war continued, there would be ample opportunity to include them in the list.

Gentlemen would perceive, also, that many of these new internal duties were to be levied on the manufactures of the country. The Government, Mr. O. said, had professed a great regard for the "infant manufactures." Iron and leather were articles of common use and necessity; and it was as essential to national independence to protect and encourage the manufacture of these articles, as the manufacture of cotton. The Committee of Ways and Means had determined to give up the tax on cotton yarn. He approved of that determination; but he could see no reason for exempting that manufacture, which did not apply with equal or greater force to the others.

He had still another reason, Mr. O. said, for increasing the direct tax beyond the amount recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means. It would be observed that the Secretary of the Treasury had recommended a National Bank, as an essential part of his plan of finance. Indeed so essential did he consider it, that it appeared to be the pivot on which his whole system turned, and without it he could not be held at all responsible for the success of his plans. Although, Mr. O. said, he was friendly to a National Bank, organized on correct and independent principles, and believed it necessary to a safe and easy management of the revenue, he could never approve of such a bank as the Secretary had proposed. It contained principles which appeared to him subversive of the very objects the Secretary had in view in its establishment. A bank with a capital of $6,000,000 in specie, and $44,000,000 in stock, for all the legitimate purposes of banking, was in truth nothing more than a bank of $6,000,000. It was impossible, in the present state of banking credit, that such a bank should loan extensively to the Government without being soon reduced to the situation of most of the other banks in the country. The effect of it, then, would be still more to sink the public credit, and embarrass the financial operations of the Government. A bank to succeed must be left perfectly free to pursue its own interests, without the interference of the Government. It must proceed in the outset with great caution, and on a limited scale, until by degrees it could draw to itself the public confidence, and restore it also to the other banking institutions in the country, and thus gradually get the whole machine again in motion. Whether it could succeed at all was extremely problematical; but it certainly could not if the wants of the Government, and not its own interests, were to be the guide of its conduct. There were other objections to the Secretary's plan, particularly the agency which the Government was to have in the appointment of directors, but he would not dwell on them. It was enough to observe that unless the proposed plan of the bank was materially modified, there was every reason to believe that it would meet with no support from the minority in the House; and perhaps it would receive but little in any shape. As there were many gentlemen in the House opposed to a bank under any circumstances, and many who would dislike its details, it became very questionable whether it would be adopted at all. Under this view of the subject, it became important to render the system of revenue, independent of the bank, more effectual and adequate.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

In every point of light, therefore, in which he had been able to consider the subject, Mr. O. said he was satisfied that an increase of the direct tax beyond the amount recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means was essential. Without it, he thought the system incomplete, and he believed it would be found ineffectual.

Having thus, Mr. O. said, submitted to the Committee the remarks that had occurred to him, to show that the disastrous state of the finances could be retrieved only by an immediate and total change in the ruinous system hitherto pursued, and a resort to a vigorous and extensive plan of internal revenue, he ought perhaps no longer to occupy the attention of the Committee. But, feeling as he did, that the great addition to the existing burdens of the people, which was about to be heaped on them, had been rendered necessary by the war, he must beg the indulgence of the Committee, while he laid before them, in a summary manner, his views of the present state and character of the war, and the line of conduct in relation to it, which he felt called upon to pursue. His sentiments, Mr. O. said, as to the origin of the war, and the objects for which it was avowedly declared, had always been uniform. At its commencement he thought, and he still thought, that it was unnecessary and inexpedient, and that it was waged for objects unattainable in themselves, and if attainable, unimportant, when considered in connexion with the immense public and private sacrifice with which a successful pursuit of them must necessarily be attended. Adverting to the circumstances under which the war was declared, to the total want of preparation for it, and the carelessness manifested by its authors about its ultimate and probable consequences, it appeared to him that the history of human folly and rashness could not present an act so enormous. When he considered the extent of individual and national injury growing out of the war; the essential interests and rights of the country staked upon its issue; the treasure which has been squandered, and the blood which has been shed in its progress; with the absence of all rational hope that it could be brought to a successful termination by the means which had been thought adequate by the Government at its commencement—all of which had been distinctly pointed out, and ought to have been foreseen by its authors—he could scarcely resist the belief that they had acted under the influence of a blind infatuation, which had alike set at defiance the plainest dictates of prudence, and the lessons which the experience of every age had taught.

He had said that the avowed objects of the war, in its commencement, were unattainable in themselves, and, if attainable, too unimportant to justify the war either in its origin or continuance. That they were now impliedly admitted to be so by the Administration itself, appeared abundantly from the documents before the public. To say nothing of the question relative to the blockades, about which there was no substantial difference between the enemy and ourselves, he would confine himself to the "principal cause of war," which had arisen out of the practice by the enemy of impressing from our merchant vessels his own seamen. It could not but be recollected that the war had been commenced, as far as it related to this branch of the quarrel, with the express design of compelling the enemy, not only to discontinue that practice in point of fact, but to stipulate by treaty that it should not be renewed. This was the ground decidedly taken by the Administration, many of its friends had gone further, and insisted that the enemy should be compelled to stipulate, not only to abandon the practice, but also to surrender the claim of right.

That such were the views of the Administration, on the subject of impressment, at the commencement of the war, and such the concessions from the enemy, which he expected to obtain, was apparent from its declarations at the time; the same views had been continued and the same intentions avowed in subsequent stages of the war. If gentlemen would advert to the correspondence between Admiral Warren and our Government, soon after its commencement, they would find the same spirit manifested. He did not know that he recollected accurately the purport of that correspondence. He had not been able, in consequence of the general destruction of the papers and documents of the House, conveniently to recur to it. He would therefore thank any gentleman on either side of the House to correct any impression relative to it which he might appear erroneously to entertain. He would then allege that the Government refused to accept the peace proffered on that occasion by the enemy, on the ground that no peace between the two countries could be secure or of long continuance unless the subject of impressment was so adjusted in the negotiation that the practice of it on the part of the enemy should entirely cease. [Here Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, rose and observed, that as the gentleman from New York had desired to be corrected in any erroneous impression he might entertain in relation to the correspondence alluded to, he would take the liberty of stating that the Government had demanded as a condition of its acceptance of the armistice offered by Admiral Warren, that the enemy should agree to discontinue the practice of impressment during the negotiation which might follow.] Mr. O. said he did not question that the statement of the honorable gentleman was substantially correct. Admitting it to be so, he said the spirit of the condition insisted on by the Government fully bore him out in the remark he had made on its views, as manifested in that correspondence. If the Government refused even to assent to a negotiation until the enemy had yielded the point in dispute, by agreeing to discontinue the practice of impressment during its pendency, it could hardly be supposed that in the negotiation itself it was not determined to insist that a complete abandonment of the practice should be expressly stipulated. He felt justified, therefore, in saying, that the Government, in the correspondence with Admiral

Warren, was actuated by its uniform conviction that no treaty of peace ought to be made with England, in which the question of impressment was not satisfactorily adjusted.

On the subject of the refusal to accede to the armistice offered by Admiral Warren, Mr. O. said, he could not forbear remarking, that the conduct of the Administration appeared to him to have been, on that occasion, not less rash and unwise than in the declaration of war. An opportunity was then afforded of extricating the country from the war with honor. The effect of the proposition of the enemy, if acceded to, would have been to have re-established the relations of peace, by restoring the two countries to the state in which they were at the commencement of the war—terms which the Government appeared willing now to accept, but which he feared could not be obtained until after a protracted and bloody contest.

The determination of the Government to adhere to the ground which it assumed in the outset, on the subject of impressment, was fully manifested in the earliest instructions to our Commissioners for negotiating peace. As far as its views could be collected from those parts of the first instructions which had been made public, and which on that point were full and explicit, it was abundantly evident that the grand object of the negotiation was, as that of the war had been, to obtain from the enemy a clear and precise stipulation by treaty, that the practice of impressment should be abandoned. If gentlemen would look at these instructions they would everywhere see, in the first stages of them, the same spirit. In the letter of the 15th of April, 1813, the Secretary of State, after observing that the war would cease, when the enemy should respect the right of our seamen (by which it was presumed the Secretary meant British seamen on board of American vessels) to be exempted from impressment, had declared that the proposition made by Mr. Russell to the British Government immediately after the war, and the answer given by the Department of State to Admiral Warren, showed the ground on which the United States were willing to adjust that controversy. In the same letter it was again declared, that to secure the United States against impressment, "a clear and distinct provision must be made against the practice"—the form was not material—all that was required was, that the British Government should "stipulate in some adequate manner to terminate or forbear the practice of impressment from American vessels." Again, in the same letter, the Commissioners were told that the great object they had to secure was, "that our flag should protect the crew," and if that was not done, the United States "had appealed to arms in vain," and that if their efforts to accomplish it failed, "all further negotiation would cease."

In the letter of the 28th of January, 1814, gentlemen would find it declared that "the sentiments of the President had undergone no change" on the important subject of impressment; that "the degrading practice must cease, our flag must protect the crew, or the United States could not consider themselves an independent nation;" and we were further told, that in agreeing to treat with Great Britain directly, "no concession was contemplated on any point in controversy." And in the letter of the 14th of February, 1814, it would be seen that the same ground was maintained even in the event of a peace in Europe.

It would thus be manifest, Mr. O. said, from a view of the official documents connected with the origin and progress of the negotiation to a late period, that the Government had all along considered a stipulation by treaty on the subject of impressment as essential to any secure and honorable peace; that it had assumed that ground as the main object of the war; that it had deemed such a stipulation not only attainable, but sufficiently important to justify the war; in that it had been made a "sine qua non" to any treaty of peace.

It was true, Mr. O. said, that the Government had occasionally varied its ground as to the limitation in point of time, of the stipulation contended for, and had gone very far in tendering to Great Britain an equivalent for such a stipulation. It had even gone the length of proposing, that the crews of our vessels should be mustered previous to the voyage, and be subjected to the examination and scrutiny of British Consuls or commercial agents. A regulation, Mr. O. said, almost, if not altogether, as degrading as the practice of impressment itself, and much more injurious to the commercial interests of the country. But, notwithstanding these concessions on subordinate points, the stipulation, in its principal feature, had been constantly adhered to in every instruction to our Ministers, down to the 25th of June, 1814.

A little previous to that time, Mr. O. said, gentlemen would recollect, that authentic intelligence was received in this country of the dethronement of the late Emperor of France. That event made it certain that peace would not only be restored in Europe, but would be restored under circumstances rendering futile any expectation which might have been entertained by our Government of reaping any advantage, in the contest with England, from the power or influence of France. The effect of this on the Administration had certainly been to lower its tone on the subject of impressment. In the letter to our Ministers of the 25th of June, 1814, the first appearance was manifested of a design to recede from the main ground. In that letter our Commissioners were instructed, that, in case no stipulation could be obtained from the British Government, either relinquishing the claim of impressment, or discontinuing the practice, they were at liberty to agree to an article, referring the subject to a future negotiation. The Government, however, still looked forward to an eventual arrangement of the difference on this point, similar to that for which it had uniformly been contending. An ultimate stipulation by treaty, discontinuing the practice of impressment, was still its object and intention. Two days afterwards, however, Mr. O. said, the views of the Government underwent a further change, and "on mature consideration" it was determined to abandon the whole ground. In the letter of the 27th of June, the Commissioners were told that they might "omit any stipulation on the subject of impressment if found indispensably necessary to terminate the war."

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

It was thus apparent, Mr. O. said, that a war, commenced for the purpose of vindicating the rights of the nation, which its authors considered essentially violated by the impressment of British seamen from our vessels, was to have been concluded by an absolute abandonment on the part of the Government, of all the grounds on which it had been declared, and the country, after two years of suffering and sacrifice, the extent of which was even now little understood, but which would be felt for generations to come, was to have been placed in the same situation, as it respected the question of impressment, in which it stood at the commencement of the war. This abandonment of the original objects of the war was not only total, but, in its effect, perpetual.

The Government, after having published to the enemy its intentions to have conceded the point, could scarcely hope to revive its claims with success in any future negotiation.

Mr. O. said he would submit to gentlemen, whether he was not borne out by the facts appearing on the face of the documents, when he repeated that the avowed objects of the war were unattainable by it; or, if attainable, too unimportant to justify either its commencement or continuance; and that they were now impliedly admitted to be so by the Administration itself. Would it be said, asked Mr. O., that the unexpected peace in Europe had defeated the hopes which the Government had entertained of bringing the contest to a successful issue? He had believed that, to the rashness of plunging the country into the war, the authors had added the folly of relying for its success, more on a favorable course of events in Europe, than on the strength and resources of their own country. He did not wish by this to be understood as entertaining a belief that the war had originated in any concert with France, or with a view to promote her interests. He knew of no satisfactory evidence to support such a belief, though it had certainly been entertained by many in this country; and so striking had been the circumstances under which the war had been declared, so well-timed in point of fact had been the blow aimed at England, and which, through her, reached her allies, that he had authority for saying that, in Europe, the impression was general, however unjust, that the war had originated in a coincidence of views and objects between our Government and the French Emperor; that we had now no friend on that Continent, and that the ear of every European Court was closed against us. He meant merely to state his own conviction, he said, that the authors of the war had rested chiefly on the success of France for a favorable issue of the contest; that they had done so in some degree did not now seem to be denied. It was evident to him, from the consideration that they had begun the war without preparation, had conducted it without vigor, and had determined to give it up entirely as soon as they knew that the fate of France was decided. He did not mention this as an impeachment of the motives of the Administration. Deeming the war just and expedient, they might have thought that prudence and sound policy required them to take the opportunity afforded by the state of things in Europe, to attack the enemy to advantage, in the hope of thus compelling him to make concessions which they could not expect to obtain by an exertion of their own means. How far the friends of the Administration might discern in this consideration an excuse for the evident rashness of the attempt, he could not conjecture. He could say, however, that he never expected to see any honest statesman, who was at the same time a wise one, compelled to lay before his country such an apology for the failure of the war.

Mr. O. said, he was aware that it had been attempted to avoid the conclusion that our Government had abandoned the grounds on which the war was commenced, by resorting to a train of reasoning, in his judgment, entirely deceptive. It had been said that, as exemption from the practice of impressment was the object of the war, and as it had been continued until the practice had in fact ceased by the peace in Europe, that object had been "essentially obtained for the present." If, indeed, the practice of impressment had ceased in consequence of the peace in Europe, it had done so because Great Britain had chosen to discontinue it for considerations growing out of her own convenience, and depending entirely on her own will. The war had in no degree contributed to produce that effect. To say that the object of the war had been essentially obtained, because the practice of impressment had ceased, when it had not ceased in consequence of the war, appeared to him a course of argument entirely unsupported. In no sense, then, could the war be considered as having succeeded. If peace were made to-morrow, it would have produced no state of things advantageous to the United States which would not exist without it, and the country would be placed in no respect in a more eligible situation than it would be, had it never been declared.

It must be evident, he thought, from the observations he had offered to the Committee, that the Administration stood committed to the country in the most serious manner. They had involved it in war for objects which they had failed to obtain, and which they had now lost all hope of obtaining; and they were unable to make peace, though they were prepared to accept it on terms which had once been offered to them. Viewing their conduct in this light, considering the feeble manner in which they had conducted the war in all its stages, how they had misapplied the means, and exhausted the resources of the country in fruitless attempts at conquest, which, if successful, would be useless; and looking, as he did, with serious alarm to the future consequences of their errors, he felt bound to express an opinion thus publicly, that they were not competent to direct the affairs of this nation in the present crisis, and that no rational hope could be entertained that any peace, which the real friends of the country could approve, would ever be obtained under their auspices.

With such impressions, and, feeling as he did, little confidence that any means which might be placed in the hands of the Administration for the support of the war and the defence of the country, would be employed with any better effect than heretofore, he had thought much of the course which he ought to adopt when the question of supplies should come before the House. The result had been, that he felt it to be his duty to vote for supplies, and to assist, as far as he was able, in the organization of a system of revenue calculated to make these supplies certain and adequate. He should therefore give his support to such parts of the plan of the Committee of Ways and Means as appeared to him to operate with tolerable equality on the different sections of the Union; and if he proposed any alterations they would not be calculated to diminish the amount of revenue, but to vary the sources from which it was to be drawn.

He was aware, he said, that he might be told that he had pursued a different course when the question of supplies was under consideration at a former session of Congress. He certainly had done so, and hence he felt it incumbent on him to state the reasons which actuated him on both occasions. He trusted his friends, with some of whom he might differ on this point, would see, from the view he had taken in the course of his remarks, that any change of conduct which might be attributed to him in this respect, had not arisen from any change in his opinions of the political character of the Administration.

Mr. O. said, as long as the war was waged on the principles on which it had been commenced, as long as it was an offensive war, a war to protect British seamen on board of American merchant vessels—and when the Administration had refused to accept an offer of peace from the enemy on terms which he thought comported with the interests, and did not infringe the honor of the nation—it had met his decided disapprobation. He had thought it not only unnecessary and inexpedient, but unjust. To a war commenced on such principles, and waged for such objects, he could never lend any countenance or support. When, therefore, on a former occasion, he had been called upon to grant supplies for carrying on the war, he had felt it, in common with his friends, to be his duty to vote against them; and if the majority of the House had, at that time, adopted a similar course, the Administration would have been compelled to have made a peace, upon terms which could then have been obtained, and which they had since in vain attempted to obtain.

But, Mr. O. said, he now considered the war, in point of fact, as essentially changed. It was now strictly a war of defence—we were attacked on every side. Instead of conquering the enemy's territory, a part of our own was in his hands. We were called on to repel invasion on every quarter. The enemy, losing sight of his own interests, and actuated by ambition or a desire of revenge, and feeling no doubt a contempt for the power and resources of the country, which the feeble conduct of the Administration was too well calculated to inspire, had made demands which rendered peace impossible, unless on terms which violated the essential interests and honor of the country. The war, therefore, was in fact a new war, to be waged on new principles, and for new objects. As long as it continued to be waged for such objects and upon such principles, and as long as the enemy persisted in his present demands, the war must be carried on, the country must be defended; and it was to be hoped, with a prospect of success, when the power and resources of the nation should be placed in abler hands.

If any plan could be devised for furnishing and applying the supplies for the war, without placing them at the disposal of the present Administration, Mr. O. said he should seize it with avidity. He knew of none, without resorting to principles and acts of a revolutionary character, which would put at hazard the existence of the National Government. The men in power were the Constitutional organs, through which the Government must be administered, while they continued to hold it. He should therefore vote for the supplies. He should act on this occasion as he would if the granting of them depended on his vote alone. If they were withheld, and the Administration should refuse to resign, the Government would be dissolved and the country ruined. If they were granted, it was barely possible, that, under their management, it could be saved.

While such were declared to be his views, Mr. O. said, as to the war under its present aspect and to the supplies necessary for carrying it on, he must be permitted, again and again, to say, that he had little hope that it would be conducted with success or brought to a safe and honorable issue by the men now in power. He should constantly repeat that the whole responsibility of the disastrous state of our affairs rested solely on them. They were responsible for having declared the war without necessity and for objects unattainable and unimportant—for having conducted it without vigor or foresight—for having ruined the finances of the country—and for having compelled a resort to this extensive and burdensome system of taxes as the only means of preventing absolute national ruin. They were responsible, too, for the new character which the war had assumed. But for the war, the British Government could never have made the demands which had now been set up;—the points now in dispute between the two countries could never have been brought into question. They had, therefore, now staked the essential rights and honor of the nation on the issue of a contest, which in the nature of things must be always doubtful. Whatever sacrifice, therefore, the country might be ultimately obliged to make for the sake of peace, would be justly chargeable to the rashness and folly which had involved it in the war.

The only radical cure, Mr. O. said, for the evils under which the country suffered, would be found in a change of Administration. That, he feared, could not be hoped for except through the process pointed out by the Constitution. From the organization of the extensive branch of our Government, the operation of public opinion, especially on our foreign relations, was slow. In England, the fiftieth part of the disasters and disgrace, which attended the progress of the war, would have driven the most powerful Ministry from their places. In this country the effect was not so speedy, but he trusted it would be as certain. The people had the remedy in their own hands, and he did not doubt they would apply it. He should not cease, as far as depended on him, to keep before the public eye the real authors of the ruin with which we are threatened. If the people wished to put an end to this destructive war, if they wished to see public and private happiness restored, they must place other men in power. If the country was not to be irretrievably ruined—if its flag was not to be struck, as the flag of the Administration had been, it must wave over other heads than those which had hitherto directed this war.

Mr. EPPES replied to a part of Mr. OAKLEY's speech, and opposed his motion.

Mr. OAKLEY explained.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, opposed the motion, and replied to Mr. OAKLEY.

Mr. OAKLEY's motion to amend Mr. EPPES's amendment, was negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. EPPES's motion was then agreed to by as large a majority.

The second resolution next came under consideration, which proposes to add to the duty on the capacity of the still a duty of twelve and a half cents per gallon on the quantity of spirits distilled.

Mr. EPPES moved to amend it, so as to make the new duty fifteen cents, instead of twelve and a half, per gallon.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to make the additional duty twenty-five cents.

This motion was advocated by Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, and opposed at considerable length by Mr. McKEE.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, with a view to affording further time for reflection on the amended report of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved that the Committee should rise.

Previous to rising—

Mr. EPPES laid upon the table resolutions embracing the further amendments which the Committee of Ways and Means proposed to make to their report, viz: a combination of a tax on paper, and an increase on the carriage tax, to produce double the present amount of the carriage tax; a classification of the licenses to retailers, and an increased duty thereon; and the establishment of a National Bank.

And then the Committee rose.—Adjourned.

SATURDAY, October 22.

Another member, to wit: from Ohio, JAMES KILBOURN, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding — dollars; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Military Committee, to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the resolutions in honor of Generals Brown, Scott, Gaines, Macomb, Ripley, Miller, and Porter, recommended a disagreement to the same; which report was concurred in.

The bill from the Senate, further extending the time for locating Virginia Military Land Warrants, and for returning the surveys to the General Land Office, was twice read, and committed.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The resolution for increasing the tax on spirits distilled being still under consideration, and Mr. FISK's motion to insert twenty-five cents per gallon (in addition to the present tax on the capacity of the still) being the question immediately before the Committee—

Mr. BAYLY said, there was a difficulty in voting for the proposition before the Committee, until they had decided the principle by which the tax should be raised—whether entirely upon the capacity of the still, as the law now is, or upon the product of the still, or upon both, as the Committee of Ways and Means had recommended. I consider, said Mr. B., as I always have, this article as a necessary and proper subject of taxation; but, as to the best manner of laying and collecting the tax, to make it productive to the Treasury and agreeable to the people, I differ from the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It is not probable that any system of taxation could be formed that would please all parts of the United States; and in discussing a tax which will be paid by some States, or parts of States, more than other States, we ought to remember that there are other articles in this report proposed to be taxed, which will balance and equalize the burden, so that, taking the whole system, there will be no cause of complaint by any other State, of paying more into the Treasury than their proportion. It is admitted by all that the tax will be paid almost entirely by the consumer, and that, whenever a high duty was laid upon any article, the price would therefore be raised in the market. It would seem, that, as the Army and Navy of the United States consume much of domestic spirits, they would in fact raise the price in the market, and thereby enable the distiller to advance the tax, which would eventually be paid by the United States. But, this tax may be so heavy as to put down some of the distilleries, (especially the small ones,) and the revenue from this article thereby fail; and Congress ought to be cautious that they do not tax the article so as to destroy the contemplated revenue which they expect to derive from it. But, I cannot agree to this double mode of taxing the capacity of the still and the product. I am opposed to the present tax upon the capacity of the still; it is unequal and inconvenient. The Secretary of the Treasury states the tax, now established by law, equal to a duty of five cents a gallon on the spirits distilled. With some distilleries, this may be the case; and distilleries on a large scale, and in great perfection, perhaps, it will not amount to more than two and a half cents on the gallon distilled. In small distilleries, such as are used by farmers, it will amount to not less than ten cents, and often fifteen. It was inconvenient, because the farmer was compelled to be at much trouble in obtaining the license, which he could not obtain for a shorter time than two weeks, although he might not have a use for his still half that time. The only reason the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means gave for continuing the present tax, was, that it would be a guide by which the collector might detect fraud, when committed by the distiller. But, the collector must know the industry and skill of the distillers, (which would be difficult,) or his knowledge of the size of the still would be useless. The collector might often raise groundless suspicions of fraud in the revenue, which would inflame and irritate the public mind against the tax, without obtaining one cent into the Treasury, which it is the duty of Congress to avoid. Mr. B. believed that fraud would very seldom be practised, and would not materially affect the revenue. The duties on all imported spirits are and have been very light; yet, the American merchant held as exalted a character for honesty as the merchant of any country; and surely the farmer might with equal safety be trusted. Mr. B. wished the direct and excise taxes would be left as the last subject of taxation reported by the Committee of Ways and Means; that, after ascertaining what might be raised from other objects, we might return to them, and make up the deficiency from them. The taxes upon cotton manufactures, furniture, leather, hats, shoes, watches, &c., are very objectionable. They will disturb the public mind, now more than sufficiently excited, and thereby weaken the Government more than the taxes which they will produce will strengthen the Treasury. The excise and direct taxes, upon equal and fair principles, were always favorite taxes with him, and the best internal taxes under a popular Government; they were certain, easy of collection; and the people, knowing that they had to pay for the support of their Government, would examine into all extravagant expenditures. But, when the money is drawn from the people by indirect means, they give themselves little or no trouble to inquire how it is expended. If the Treasury had been supported partly by a direct tax, it is not probable that the people had suffered their commerce to be destroyed by your non-intercourse restrictions and embargoes, and thereby lose the revenue from our foreign trade, which must have been supplied in part by taxes on land, their Treasury never would have been emptied by schemes and experiments, nor would this war have existed. Mr. B. observed, that no man was more averse to this war than he was, and it was well known that he was opposed to the Administration; but, opposed as he was to the war and Administration, such was the danger in which the country was placed, and the character of conquest which this war had assumed on the part of the enemy, that he would not withhold the resources of the country from the Administration, but would give every aid in his power to bring it to a glorious conclusion. And he was willing that the Administration should possess all the honors gained by such a peace. He did not agree with most of his friends with whom he acted, that the campaign now drawing to a close was inglorious to our arms. It is true, that, at the commencement of the war, the Navy far outshone the Army; and the reason is obvious; our small and gallant Navy was manned by sailors who had been long accustomed to danger, and, as soon as they were on board the ship, they were ready for action. Not so with the Army. Time was required to form the recruit into a useful soldier. Our armies are now formed, and are equal in discipline and courage to our enemy, as this campaign has proved. He would, therefore, impose taxes upon such articles as would be paid by the community without complaint, and draw a safe and productive revenue into the Treasury; and he was persuaded they would be cheerfully paid, when the people were satisfied that they were necessary to their safety. But, the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McKee,) and his honorable colleague, (Mr. Eppes,) are opposed to a great increase of the excise and direct tax, because they bear harder upon Kentucky and Virginia than some other States now advocating these taxes. Before this war, the Eastern States paid more than a proportion of taxes to the General Government, by the aid of their extensive commerce, which is now gone. Their ships and fisheries are destroyed, and it may be recollected that this war is the cause, which Kentucky and Virginia had a great agency in producing. If, then, by raising the money to carry on this war, it should be found that these States paid a fraction more than other States, they ought to pay it with cheerfulness.

Mr. B. observed, he could not agree with many of his friends in desiring the President to take into his Administration Federal men. He believed it would be difficult to prevail upon Federal gentlemen of high and commanding talents to take any of the departments of the Government, and he should think it a misfortune to the Federal cause if such an arrangement should take place. For, the affairs of the country could not prosper with a divided Administration; and it is impossible, in a Government constituted as that of the United States, that any Administration could conduct prosperously the affairs of the country, at the present dangerous and perplexing crisis, without the confidence and support of the people. I must therefore give to the Administration now in power all the resources of the country; and I will not, in my Legislative capacity, withhold all support from them, and thereby endanger the existence of the Constitution. But, sir, at elections I shall, as I always have, use every fair and honorable exertion to displace them; and, when a complete change is made in the public sentiment, then, and not till then, do I wish to see a Federal Administration.

The Ways and Means.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, moved to amend the resolution by striking out the whole of it and inserting, in place of it, "that it is expedient to lay a duty of — cents, on every gallon of spirits distilled from domestic material in lieu of the duty now imposed." The object of this motion was to lay the tax altogether on the quantity distilled.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, spoke at some length to prove that so high a tax as was proposed on distillation would be perfectly illusory, as it would amount to a prohibition of the manufacture of the article in many parts of the country; and, if it were not illusory, the tax would be so unequal in its operation as to be extremely unjust, particularly to the State which he represented.

Mr. BAYLY spoke in explanation and reply to Mr. McKEE. In the course of his observations, he said that he conceived an equalized direct tax, and a tax on spirituous liquors, as the best taxes, if not the only ones that ought to be imposed under popular government.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, was in favor of an amendment fixing the tax wholly either on the product or on the capacity of the still, instead of retaining the tax on both as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. Although he knew the whiskey tax was considered as bearing with particular severity on Kentucky, he knew too, from the feelings of the people of that State, that they would pay any tax Congress should lay on the article—though he hoped it would not, therefore, be taxed higher than it would bear.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, was of opinion that Maryland paid as high a tax as any State in proportion to its capital; but he was desirous to carry into effect the project of the Secretary of the Treasury in every particular, and, therefore, although the tax would bear hard on his State, he should vote to tax the distillation of liquor thirty cents per gallon on the product of the still.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, entered into an argument to show that it would be highly impolitic to abandon the tax on the capacity of the still, and was, therefore, opposed to the present amendment.

Mr. CYRUS KING, of Massachusetts, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I owe to the Committee an apology for rising thus early in the debate, before gentlemen of greater experience and of longer standing on this floor have had an opportunity of expressing their sentiments. This course, however, I am compelled to pursue in consequence of what fell from the honorable gentleman from New York yesterday in debate upon this subject.

Had I been satisfied with the practical conclusion to which that honorable gentleman brought himself, I should have remained silent, and with him have united with the majority in voting for additional taxes. But this, after the most mature consideration, I cannot do. No one laments more sincerely than I do, the distressing state to which our country is reduced by corrupt men and ruinous measures. No one will go further in a correct and honorable course to relieve her from our present embarrassments. No one can more ardently desire the return of the blessings of peace on fair and honorable conditions—so necessary for the Government, so indispensable for the people. But I do not think that the road pointed out by that gentleman, will lead directly to that desirable end.

If the war, as he admits, and as every reflecting man must admit, was inexpedient in its origin, and is ruinous in its prosecution, I have seen nothing to change its character. As well might the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots. If the Administration who declared this war were weak, corrupt, and wicked, as the gentleman will concede, have they, too, changed their natures? and if not, can honest men possibly unite with them? If, as the honorable gentleman correctly observes, the extreme depth of the folly of these men in declaring and conducting this war was such that even his intelligence could not fathom it—if, as he says, they have abused the confidence reposed in them, and lavished the blood and treasure of the nation in foolish and wicked contests, can we, in honor, unite with such monsters? Can we justify ourselves to our constituents, our consciences, or our God, in assisting to put into the power of such men the lives and the remains of the fortunes of our fellow-citizens? I believe in God we cannot.

But the honorable gentleman attempts to justify his course by saying that the nature of the war has wholly changed from offensive to defensive. Is this indeed the case? Where is the only efficient army which the Administration has? Is it not invading Canada? Is it not carrying fire and sword into the heart of that country? And shall we be seriously told that this, on the part of the Administration, is a defensive war? It is true, sir, as far as respects the people of this country and the State Governments, that it is a defensive war. It is true, sir, that the yeomanry of the country, the owners of the soil, are obliged to defend that, and their wives, and their children, and their firesides, against the attacks of the enemy, along the whole of your seacoast; while your Administration, who are bound by the Constitution to defend us, are dreaming of the conquest of Canada, and are sending their soldiers in that direction, to places where we have little property and few inhabitants to protect, but leaving exposed to the incursions of the enemy the whole Atlantic frontier. Like the dog in the fable, they catch at the shadow, and lose the substance.

The honorable gentleman has hinted, for he did not hazard the assertion, that some people in this country, and many in Europe, believe this war of French origin. I have no hints to give on this, or any other subject, but assert, as I believe, and I believe it as I do my existence, that this is a French war, and I have no doubt that a majority of this nation, and all Europe, think the same, and act upon that belief. I very well know, sir, that this Government has lately plead "not guilty" to this charge, on the ground, no doubt, that direct evidence of their guilt cannot be produced. So, sir, in our courts of justice, we every day hear the most notorious offenders plead the general issue of "not guilty," and even be acquitted by their country because there was not sufficient evidence of their guilt, though every honest man in the nation believes them guilty. But let us hear what those gentlemen, the Administration, say in their defence. "No reliance was placed on the good offices of France, in bringing the war with Great Britain to a satisfactory conclusion." But they dare not say they did not rely on the "good offices" or power of the French tyrant when they declared that war. But, they proceed: "He (the President) nevertheless knew that France held a place in the political system of Europe and of the world, which, as a check on England, would not fail to be useful to us." No doubt he knew it while France "held" under her tyrant, not holds, under her legitimate Sovereign, a place among nations; and all Europe knew it, felt it, and trembled, while our Administration were courting his "good offices." Like the contemptible jackal to the lion, while the imperial beast of France was greedily pursuing his prey, our dastardly Administration expected to extort their dirty portion from its fears. I was induced to advert to this French origin of the war, for the purpose of distinctly stating to the American people that the allies in Europe, the great and good Alexander the Deliverer among the rest, all so consider it. Nay, more sir, they believe your Administration only a branch of the power of the late imperial, now fallen tyrant, which power they are determined to destroy, root and branch. Let not the people, then, of this country, delude themselves with the hope of peace while the present men wield the destinies of this nation. Foreign nations, sir, have no confidence in the amicable professions of your Administration; they have forfeited all respect, and no honorable peace will ever be made with them. Not, sir, that any foreign nation would pretend to dictate to us, or in the smallest degree interfere with our internal regulations. To this I would not submit from any nation. But the people ought to know that England will not make peace with a set of men whom she thinks corrupt and wicked. Can we then, sir, ought we to unite with such men in the prosecution of this French war? Besides, sir, do we not condemn the friends of this Administration for supporting such weak and corrupt rulers, and shall we not condemn ourselves if we unite with them in that support? Honest men will decide.

The Ways and Means.

For these, among other reasons, I cannot unite in support of the present Administration. I shall now proceed to state some of the reasons which compel me to vote against the whole system, or rather scheme of finance reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, whereby they calculate to raise from the people of this country, directly or indirectly, by new or increased taxes, $11,635,000, in addition to the sum of $10,800,000, raised in the same manner, or to be raised the present year; making a grand total for the people to pay in taxes, for 1815, $22,435,000 to the national Government, which does not, and cannot protect them. Before I proceed to the reasons above alluded to, permit me to hold up to the view of the American people two pictures, one of the expenses of a year in peace, the other of a year of war. The expense of our Peace Establishment before the war, was (as the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Campbell, informs us, in his able and faithful annual report made to the House of Representatives on the 26th of September, 1814,) - - - $7,000,000

Interest on the debt existing prior to the war - - - - - 1,900,000

Making a total of - - - - $8,900,000

He further informs us, that the sums authorized by Congress to be expended during the year 1814, and for which appropriations have been made, are as follows:

Amounting, in the whole, to $47,270,172. This sum the Government expected to provide thus:

From the customs - - - -	$6,500,000
Sales of public lands - - -	600,000
Direct tax and internal duties - -	3,800,00
Postage and incidental receipts - -	50,000
Loans and Treasury notes - - -	33,592,665
Balance said to be in the Treasury -	2,272,507

Making a total of - - - - $47,270,172

Of the sum the Government expected to raise by loans, after begging, hiring, and submitting to the grossest usury, they are still deficient more than thirteen millions and a half of dollars, according to the first and dashing report from the new Secretary Dallas, to the Committee of Ways and Means. This statement shows a balance in favor of peace of $38,370,172, of course the amount which one year of war costs the people.

I will now, sir, by your indulgence and that of the Committee, state some of the reasons which compel me to vote against the war taxes. Of these reasons, sir, some will be local and others general. While our attention is directed to the interest of the whole, we ought not to neglect that of any part.

First.—I shall vote against this report as a citizen of New England, because that section of the country was not represented in the committee which made it, although its inhabitants, if the taxes are imposed, will be called upon to pay a large proportion of them. How this happened, whether by design or accident, I know not; but such is the fact, that no member from New England was put upon that important committee.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

But the Middle, Southern, and Western States, engrossed the whole. I would not be understood to implicate the honorable Speaker of this House, who appoints our committees, and who discharges the duties of his office with distinguished ability. It may have been accident, or he may only have followed the example of some bad predecessor. Nor, sir, would I suggest that the committee is not composed of gentlemen of ability and integrity. But, sir, they cannot understand the interest of that part of our country so well as a member therefrom. They cannot have the feelings, the interest, or the views of citizens of New England. New England appears to be proscribed; put under the ban of empire. These things create suspicions of designs against her rights and liberties. I cannot sanction this procedure by my vote.

Second.—This Administration have, by their weak and wicked measures, so impoverished our citizens, that they have not the ability to pay these oppressive taxes. Shall we lay upon them additional burdens, when they are now almost pressed to the dust by those which you have already heaped upon them? Let us hear what Mr. Secretary Dallas says upon this subject:

"The wealth of the nation, in the value and products of its soil, in all the acquisitions of personal property, and in all the varieties of industry, remains almost untouched by the hand of Government."

Is this indeed true? Let me ask the farmer in the middle States the value of his wheat and his flour now spoiling on his hands; the merchant in the East the value of his lumber and his fish without purchasers; his acquisition of property, deprived by the acts of the Government of the accustomed means of enterprise; the ship owner, the rich return of his vessels, now only food for worms; the sailor and mechanic, the value of their industry in all its varieties. These will all exclaim, that they have been sorely touched by the hand of this Government. That "the little finger of this oppressive Administration is thicker than the loins" of the Father of his Country. That this Administration has afflicted them as the great enemy of mankind was permitted to afflict the perfect and upright man, by touching all they possess, and they are almost ready to "curse them to their faces." But what does the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means say on this subject?

"In Europe, the price of agricultural products is not materially affected by a state of war: the produce of the earth is there consumed within the country in peace and in war. The situation of the United States is entirely different; with an extensive and fertile country, and a small population compared to the extent of our territory, we have annually a large surplus to export to foreign markets, over and above what is necessary for consumption. On the export of this surplus, which is cut off by the war, depends in a great degree the ability of the farmer to meet taxes."

By this it appears that the wealth of the nation, composed by the wealth of every individual in that nation, subject to taxation, does but remain almost untouched by the hand of Government. And, sir, I consider this war, for every purpose of misery and distress, as having existed for nearly eight years—since the embargo, by Mr. Jefferson, in 1807. A constant hostility has, since that period, been maintained by the Government against the industry, property, and enterprise of our citizens, by their restrictive and oppressive acts, whereby thousands of our citizens are reduced to beggary; to a situation that scarce any change can be for the worse.

In New England, too, sir, we are obliged to pay our State tax, county tax, town tax, and parish tax—(the latter, some gentlemen on this floor may not understand.) Consider, too, sir, that our citizens are deprived of the usual means of obtaining supplies for these objects, and for the maintenance of their families. Lumber, the fisheries, and commerce, were our chief dependence. Our lumber, which before the war found a ready market at ten and fifteen dollars the thousand, is now merely nominal, at four or five. The bank fisheries are destroyed; and it now seems, from the terms of the enemy, that we are in a fair way to lose the best portion of our coast fishery. Our vessels are now confined to our ports. It must be known likewise that the inhabitants of the seaport towns in Maine were accustomed to receive two-thirds of the provisions required for their support, in articles of the first necessity, coastwise. And in proportion as their means of purchasing provisions have decreased, the price of provisions has increased. Flour, which was formerly bought for six or eight dollars, has, for some time past, been fifteen and sixteen dollars the barrel. Indian corn, which sold for seventy-five cents the bushel before the war, was, the last Summer, one dollar and a half and two dollars the bushel, and so of many other articles of prime necessity. The consequence of this has been such as was probably expected and wished by the Government. Many of our respectable citizens, sailors, and mechanics, have, for subsistence, been forced into the ranks of your Army, and marched into Canada. Yes, sir, I have to regret, say, to lament, the fate of many valuable citizens, some personal friends, who have thus fallen victims to the diseases of that climate, or the sword of the enemy—far distant from their homes, with no friendly hand to relieve their sufferings or soothe their distress; in death they cast a fond recollection back upon their country and the dear objects of their affection, then closed their eyes in despair. With the hope of giving some relief, I have since entered the dwellings of their families, once the abodes of prosperity and happiness, now of wretchedness and woe. I have beheld their disconsolate widows and helpless parents in misery and want, and their children crying for bread. Do then, Oh God, now their only supporter, according to the petition in thy prayer, give them each day their daily bread.

But when the poor have thus cried, Madison has not wept; "ambition is made of sterner stuff" than this.

Third reason.—As a citizen of New England I am opposed to laying this additional burden upon my fellow-citizens, because no part of the money, thus to be raised, will be applied to the payment of the expense incurred by those States in calling out and subsisting their militia, for the defence of their soil and families. This information we have from the Secretary of War himself, in his answer to the letter of His Excellency, Governor Strong, upon that subject. That no part of the expense thus incurred would be reimbursed, unless our troops were placed under the orders of the commanders of their military districts. This is a species of command we know nothing of. Military districts!—by what right, what authority, what usurpation established?—they are unknown to our laws, unknown to our Constitution, and abhorrent to our feelings. For what purpose is our country gerrymandered into military districts? Can you inform me, sir? I did indeed once hear on this floor the purpose avowed for which they were established, and the use to which they were destined. I did hear an honorable gentleman in debate, and I heard him with horror and detestation, alluding to some rumors of dissatisfaction in the East, thank his God, that there was within each military district of this country a physical force sufficient to put down the first movements of popular discontent. What, sir, are we under a military despotism? Must we be butchered if we dare complain of our wrongs. Is this the Republican form of Government guaranteed to us by the Constitution? Is this the freedom for which our ancestors fought and bled? If so, then Warren and the succeeding martyrs of the Revolution died in vain. No, sir, New England will not submit to it. No military despot shall ever reign there. I, too, thank my God that there is within each State in New England the brave yeomanry of the country, hearts of oak, ready and determined to beat down tyranny and oppression under their feet.

But who are the officers under whose command your President wishes to place our hardy soldiers? In Massachusetts he is an officer whom your President himself has recalled from a command in Canada with every mark of disgrace. In New Hampshire is an officer, who, when in command in Canada, suffered himself to be taken by a handful of the enemy; and of so little consequence was he, in the view of your Government, that they let him rust in Canada, unexchanged, until he almost became a subject of his Britannic Majesty. His pay and rations, however, went on, which was some consolation. Sir, our militia officers would think themselves disgraced, and throw up their commissions, if they were ordered under such commanders. But, sir, the principle on which this military gerrymander is formed is what I most deprecate. If your President can thus divide the States into military sections, and place over each a general officer, what prevents his appointment of all the subordinate officers in the same districts, ready to take from our militia officers their commands as soon as they take the field—thus violating, in the very letter, that part of the Constitution which reserves “to the States respectively the appointment of the officers of the militia”? There is nothing that will prevent his doing this, seeing he has the disposition, but the determined resistance of the people, who are accustomed “to anticipate the evil, and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. “They augur misgovernment at a distance, and snuff up the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.” If then, sir, you will not defend New England, New England will defend herself, and will keep her resources for her own occasions. “Millions for our defence, but not a cent for tribute.”

Fourth reason.—I cannot unite in supporting this Administration, with Mr. Madison at their head, because he has always shown a settled and determined spirit of hostility against the enterprise, the commerce, the rights, and above all, the patriots of New England. In confirmation of this, with mingled sensations of pride and disdain, I descend to notice the mean, dastardly connexion between this Government and one John Henry; where your President gave to that scoundrel and traitor, fifty thousand dollars of the people's money, to purchase up, as he fondly hoped, calumny and detraction against the first patriots in New England; that he was disappointed in his malicious and revengeful hopes and designs was not his fault. The traitor received his fifty thousand dollars from the hand of your President, who sent him, in one of our public ships, out of the reach of justice, even to the imperial Bonaparte. Sir, this impotent attempt by your President, to sully the character of New England, will never be forgotten. It will be forgiven, for our holy religion commands us to forgive our greatest enemies, persecutors, and slanderers. Thank God, New England is covered with the heavenly canopy of integrity and patriotism; the arrows of malevolence fall harmless at her feet.

But this Government has, since 1806, constantly manifested a deadly hostility against the commerce and rights of New England; by their embargoes, non-intercourse, and non-importations; some of the provisions of which were infinitely more unjust and oppressive than the writs of assistance, so justly complained of, at the commencement of the Revolution. These writs gave to the custom-house officers and their deputies power to enter any private houses, &c., “that they would say they suspected.” Now, sir, some of the provisions of your laws authorized them to do this, without saying anything—without writ, or right. I have before asserted on this floor, and now, after the most deliberate consideration, I repeat, that this Administration have brought upon this nation many of the evils which produced the Revolution; that they are in fact, acting over the tyranny of Britain, against New England, with increased aggravation. What, let me ask, was a Boston port bill compared with a general embargo? what a duty on a few unimportant articles, compared with the taxes and oppressions which this Administration have brought upon this people? As much as I detest and abhor the tyranny and oppression of a Grafton, a North, or a Bute, and their hireling associates in different Ministries in England, against this country, I would not do them the injustice to compare them with a set of men and measures which would disgrace them. If a simple King of England, by his corrupt servants, chastised New England with whips, this Administration have chastised her with scorpions. A repetition of the same grievances will remind us of the remedy. I very well know the apology that is offered by gentlemen on this occasion—that our situation is changed—that New England is represented on this floor, but was not in Parliament. Is she indeed represented here? What influence has New England in this Congress, more than she had in the Parliament of England? She has members here to state her grievances, and demand redress. She had friends there, able and distinguished, to do the same. Has the interest of New England been at all consulted for these eight years past? Have her grievances been redressed? Let her impoverished, ruined citizens, answer the question. We complain of grievances, and we are told that we are represented here. We complain of the oppression of Administration, and are told that they are the choice of the people. The people do not choose rulers to oppress and tyrannize. The moment they thus act, they forfeit their character of rulers, and ought to be deposed. What, sir, shall we be told that a hereditary Sovereign in Europe, may, for his crimes, be deposed and brought to the block—while a petty tyrant of four years standing, “strong enough to suppress, but unable to protect,” shall, in this free country, live out his political life. No, sir, the same crime which would bring one man to the block, ought to bring the other to the halter.

What influence, I repeat, has New England in the Administration, or in Congress, when the whole of the Administration, and a majority of both Houses of Congress, live south and west of the Delaware? Will you appeal to their measures as an evidence? In them we see nothing but ruin and oppression. Will honorable gentlemen come nearer home, and examine the Journals of this House; here we see a rask majority ranged against New England. Look at your committees, even the least important; do you find a majority of New England interest, or of Federal Republicans (to speak plain) in either. No, sir, New England influence is carefully excluded the walls of this House, and was excluded from the palace (before Mr. Madison permitted the enemy to burn it) lest the pure slave spirit should be contaminated. Yes, sir, I consider this Administration as alien to us. So much so, that New England would be justified in declaring them, like all foreign nations, “enemies in war, in peace friends.” The States of New England, sir, can never be satellites in any system. But, like primary planets, they will revolve round the sun of Federalism, until the Almighty hand which created, shall dash them from their orbits forever.

To show the wonderful consistency of the men now in power, they have not only acted over the tyranny of England against this country, but they are now actually acting over what in times past they affected to call the tyranny and oppression of Washington and Adams, in excise laws and internal taxes. If honorable gentlemen acted on principle in their opposition then they were, and have continued, unprincipled. If it be retorted that we ought to support these laws, we answer that we do not deem them necessary, that our support is not necessary to their passage. Sir, allegiance and protection are reciprocal—the people of the United States ordained the Constitution, among other important provisions, “to provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.” This defence, this welfare, and these blessings, it was the duty of this Administration to provide for the people. How they have done it, our defenceless country will show. Nay, sir, we have ocular demonstration, within sight of this Hall; nay, more, this Hall itself is demonstration, driven as we have been by the enemy and the neglect of the Government from our splendid Capitol to the places of mere patent machines. And that we have the honor of occupying the places of patent machines, we owe to the charity of the enemy, begged by Dr. Thornton of the Patent Office, that he might have where to bestow these models of the arts and of taste. Yes, sir, every part of your city exhibits vestiges of the enemy, and of the criminal neglect of your Government. Yes, sir, the proud banner of that enemy has waved over the Capitol, and all your public edifices are in ruins. Add to this—your Government with the President at their head, pale with fear, flying before a few thousand British troops. The patriot turns from this scene with horror and disgust. Is this the man whom the people have chosen to go in and out before them and lead their armies to battle and to conquest? Is this the kind of protection which he affords to this bleeding country? From such protection and such protectors O Lord deliver my country!

It may be demanded of me, if I am willing to abandon our Navy and Army, without pay, without reward; far, very far from it. My sentiments on this subject cannot be unknown or mistaken. The steady bravery and perfect discipline of our gallant seamen, evinced by their repeated and splendid victories; the heroism lately displayed by some of our Generals, their officers and troops, in many sanguinary and successful battles, flash lightning upon the surrounding darkness, rendering it more palpable.

New England will not give up the ship, nor the seamen either! She is prepared to swim or sink, conquer or die, with them. But, sir, this Administration have not the ability to reward them; they have lost the confidence of the people, and cannot command the resources of the nation. It will devolve on the first, fast friends of the Navy to reward our brave tars, when the “troubled night” of this Administration departs, “and the star of peace returns.”

In relation to the subject more immediately before the Committee, as to the increase of taxes, for the reasons which I have given, and as to the scheme of a National Bank, reported by Mr. DALLAS, for reasons which I may assign when that subject may be taken up—I shall vote against the whole. In relation to the detail of this business, as it respects a proper selection of articles or of equalizing them through the States, I shall endeavour correctly to do my duty.

Before I conclude, sir, there is one subject upon which I wish correctly to be understood, and upon which some of the gentlemen on this side of the House have been misrepresented. I allude to the motives and views of gentlemen in and out of this House, opposed to the Administration of Mr. Madison. Could I for a moment believe that a base and corrupt desire of office, or emolument, or power, influenced them, that moment would I abandon them, and esteem them as base as those they oppose. Could I believe, that any other desire actuated them, than to relieve the people from distress, and our country from ruin—I should consider them unworthy the name of patriots—unworthy the name of Americans—unworthy the air and light of Heaven. Let honorable gentlemen consult their own breasts upon this subject, they will find the charge of corrupt motives impossible. Do they find the taste of power so sweet, the couch of ambition so soft, that they are to be courted for enjoyment, and not for the elevated object of rendering happy a whole people? If they have discharged their duty to their country and to their God, they will have no difficulty in answering the question.

But union it seems is now the watch word. Does the Administration desire it? Do the majority in this House desire it? Had either made the least advance or concession for it? Though urged by the nation, has Mr. Madison called round him the wise and the good without distinction of party? Let his Cabinet answer. One important office vacant, and a continual fluctuation and succession of officers, at a time when he ought to have the constant and best advice of the wisest men of the nation. Another office sold in fee to a foreigner by birth, or held by him for another naturalized citizen, now abroad on an important mission, and who qualified himself in the school of insurrection for his distinction. Is our Treasury always to be a prey to foreigners and traitors, Henry and others? The American people will correct this procedure, or not complain of an empty Treasury. But what advances have the majority in this House made towards a coalition? Do they not, upon every important subject of debate, unsheath the sword of contention, and cast away its scabbard? And how were even the advances of the honorable gentleman from New York, received yesterday? With coldness—no, sir, they were rejected with contempt. Conscious of their strength, they do not want our assistance; they fear that some on this side of the House may stand between them and office. They do not want our assistance to pass their laws, and God forbid they should have it, for on some of these laws are impressed the image and superscription of oppression—I will not, by my vote, give currency to such base coin.

If, sir, this Administration will abandon the evil course and evil advice which they have pursued so long, will return to a sense of duty to themselves, and justice to their country—if Mr. Madison will cease to hearken to evil counsellors, and will give up his inefficient and corrupt agents; will form a Cabinet of the most experienced and wisest statesmen of our country, and will surrender the conduct of affairs wholly to them—I will be among the first with heart and hand to support them. Until Mr. Madison does this, I can only advise him, in the words of an experienced statesman, “to retract his odious exertions of authority; and to remember that the first step towards making New England contribute to his wants, is to reconcile her to his Government.”

[Mr. KING was called to order soon after commencing his speech, as wandering from the order of debate, by debating questions of a general nature on a proposition to change the tax from the capacity to the product of the still. The CHAIRMAN decided that, according to the general practice, the gentleman was in order. From this decision Mr. FISK, of New York, appealed. After some conversation on the point of order—

The decision of the Chairman was reversed by the Committee.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts then moved indefinitely to postpone the consideration of this question; which motion was declared not in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING then declared himself in favor of continuing the tax on the capacity of the still, and imposing the additional duty on the product of the still—though he should vote against any increase of the present taxes.]

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, was also of opinion that a combination of the tax on the capacity and on the product was most expedient, and was for adhering in all respects to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EPPES assigned the reasons why the Committee of Ways and Means had been in favor of retaining the present tax on the capacity—they were, to secure the collection of the product, and to abridge as much as possible the domiciliary visits of the excise officers for proving the liquor, &c., which would then be unnecessary.

Mr. INGHAM said he was fully justified in stating the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury to be, that the communication of the capacity-tax was indispensable to the due collection of the product-tax.

Mr. YANCEY advocated the adoption of the amendment he had proposed. He considered the arguments against it, though specious, to be fallacious. The present system, he contended, operated unequally, and would continue to do so under the increased duty, unless the system was changed. He saw no occasion for the employment of excise officers at all in the collection of the tax, which might be as well collected by compelling distillers to make monthly returns on oath.

The question was then taken on Mr. YANCEY's motion (going to throw the tax altogether on the product of the still) and negatived. For the motion 45, against it 76.

The question on Mr. Fisk's motion to insert twenty-five cents per gallon was then decided in the negative. For the motion 57, against it 64.

The question being taken a second time, by request, there were for the motion 62, against it 71.

Mr. Fisk, of New York, then moved to strike out twelve and a half, and insert twenty. For the motion there were 69, against it 70.

Another count being demanded, there appeared to be for the motion 67, against it 69.

So the motion was negatived.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. EPPES to insert fifteen, and decided as follows: For the motion 68, against it 62.

So the House resolved that an additional duty on distillation of fifteen cents per gallon on the product of the still, ought to be laid.

The Committee then rose and reported the two resolutions agreed to in committee, and asked and obtained leave to sit again on the remainder of the report.

MONDAY, October 24.

Another member, to wit: from New Hampshire, WILLIAM HALE, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. BIGELOW presented a petition of sundry members of an association of Ministers, known by the name of the Westminister Association, in the country of Worcester, and State of Massachusetts, praying that the mails may not be transported or opened on the Sabbath day.—Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Louisiana, praying a confirmation of their respective titles to lands held by virtue of a requette or petition to the Governors of that country, whilst under the jurisdiction of the French and Spanish Governments.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT,

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and the Postmaster General, be directed to communicate to this House such information as may be in their power, in relation to the destruction of official books and papers, in their respective Departments, in consequence of the incursion of the enemy in the month of August, 1814; designating particularly what description of books and papers has been lost thereby, and what the probable effect of such loss will be in the adjustment of the unsettled accounts of the United States.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments to the resolutions "expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Major General Brown, Major General Scott, and Brigadiers Ripley, Miller, Porter, Gaiges, and Macomb," and ask a conference upon the subject of the said amendments; to which conference they have appointed managers on their part.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the remainder of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The third resolution came first next under consideration, in the following words:

Resolved, That it is expedient to add one hundred per cent. on the present duty on sales at auction.

Some conversation took place between Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, and Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, as to the equality of the general system of taxation proposed.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to amend the motion by striking out one hundred and inserting fifty per cent.; under the impression that the proposed increase would have the effect, by throwing sales into the hands of commission merchants, to diminish the present product of the tax.

Mr. EPPES made some observations in reply. He saw no reason why, when other taxes were to be so generally increased, this item should be excepted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, made some observations to show the extreme inequality and oppressiveness of the additional tax on distillation, compared with any other tax proposed, which he said, by the way, would, he feared, operate nearly as a prohibition of that manufacture. He was surprised, after gentlemen had so strenuously insisted on the enormous increase of that tax, that they should oppose the paltry increase of the tax now proposed.

Mr. POST made a statement to show that the increase of the tax would not increase the revenue at all. The only taxes, he appeared to conceive, on which solid reliance could be placed, to insure the requisite amount of revenue, were the land tax and the whiskey tax. The consumption of whiskey, he argued, would not be diminished essentially if it were taxed an hundred, instead of fifteen cents per gallon; and, whatever was the amount of that tax, it eventually came out of the pocket of the consumer, though immediately paid by the manufacturer.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, expressed his regret at the sectional discussion of the taxes. He entreated gentlemen to abandon their local objections to the various taxes, as he should himself do. The State which he represented paid much more than a due proportion, according to its representation, of the internal taxes. But no system of taxation could ever be carried into effect in this country without a reciprocal spirit of compromise, which he therefore hoped to see superseding the local feelings which were displayed on this occasion.

Mr. WRIGHT said, so far from entertaining any sectional feeling on this occasion, he was prepared to agree to the whole system proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury; but protested against dividing it, and taking it by piecemeal.

The question on Mr. Fisk's motion was decided in the negative by a considerable majority; and the original resolution was adopted.

The fourth resolution, "that it is expedient to add fifty per cent. to the present duties on the conveyance of papers and letters," was next considered, and having been amended, on motion of Mr. EPPES, by striking out fifty and inserting an hundred per cent., it was agreed to, without debate.

The next resolution, "that the carriage tax ought to be increased, and a duty on plated harness so imposed as to produce double the amount of the present duty on carriages," was agreed to.

The next resolution that came under consideration was, that "it is expedient to class the retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and impose an additional duty thereon of fifty per cent."

Mr. POST vehemently objected to this tax as applying exclusively to one class of the community.

Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. EPPES replied; and

The resolution was agreed to without a division.

The next resolution which came under consideration was the following:

Resolved, That it is expedient to impose a duty on the following articles, viz: manufactured tobacco and snuff, in the hands of the manufacturer; candles, of tallow and spermaceti; hats; yarn, spun by the aid of machinery worked by steam or water; leather; pig iron; castings; bar, rolled, and slit iron; and on nails made by the aid of machinery; on furniture above a certain value, except beds, bedding, and articles of domestic manufacture, in the hands of the owner; beer, ale, and porter, in the hands of the manufacturer; boots and shoes, above a certain price, in the hands of the manufacturer; on plated harness, in the hands of the owner; on vats for the manufacture of paper; on saddles and bridles, above a certain price, in the hands of the owner; on gold and silver watches, in the hands of the owner; on pleasure horses, kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage; on playing cards, and on lotteries."

Mr. EPPES, in pursuance of the further instructions of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to strike out several articles of the above enumeration.

The first he moved to be stricken out was cotton yarn.

Mr. EPPES assigned as a reason for this motion the fear of destroying manufactures yet in their infancy, and information received that this manufacture was not as profitable as at first believed.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, objected to this motion, believing that no manufacture would better bear or be more able to pay a pretty considerable tax.

The motion was decided thus: For the motion 74, against it 46.

So cotton yarn was exempted from taxation.

The next article proposed to be stricken out was shoes.

As a reason for this motion, Mr. EPPES assigned the great difficulty of discrimination between the large manufactories, and those of an individual or domestic character.

The motion was agreed to without a division.

The next motion was to change the tax on paper vats to a tax of five per cent. on all paper manufactured. Agreed to, without opposition.

The next question was to strike out lotteries; which motion was negatived without debate.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to strike out the furniture tax; assigning as reasons therefor its odious character, because rendering necessary valuations of property, domiciliary visits, &c.

Mr. EPPES defended the tax, and stated that no inquisitions were intended to be made into property, the amount of which was proposed to be ascertained by voluntary declaration of the possessors. He considered it a very proper tax on luxury and superfluity.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, also opposed the proposed amendment in an argumentative manner, on the grounds of policy and justice, convinced as he was of the necessity of raising a substantial revenue to supply the wants and support the credit of the Government; he was opposed to the subduction of so great a proportion of the proposed amount of taxation as the erasure of this tax would occasion. Mr. B. spoke at some length and with much ability on the subject of taxation generally.

Mr. WRIGHT supported his colleague's motion. He was opposed to the tax, as an inquisition into private property; as vexatious, if the property was valued by inspection; and encouraging immorality, if valued by assessment on the oath of the proprietors. He was opposed to it, too, because it would in fact operate as a tax on matrimony, from which those who lived their whole lives in violation of the first law of nature would generally be exempt. He considered it, too, in the nature of a direct tax, and which therefore ought to be apportioned according to representation.

Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, also advocated the motion. The property proposed to be reached by this tax belonged generally to those who have seen better times, but, by the operation of the war, are thrown out of their regular income, and are many of them obliged to sell this very furniture to supply them with bread.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, also supported the motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, principally on account of the novelty of the tax, it being a tax never before laid, if ever proposed in any Government. There were other strong reasons against it, particularly the mode in which the tax must be assessed, &c. In opposing this tax, Mr. G. said he at least was not influenced by sectional motives, as it would fall as lightly on the section of country which he represented, as perhaps any other. He was opposed to any tax of a questionable expediency, because all the taxes were to be pledged to the public creditor, and would therefore be irrevocable until his demands were satisfied.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Kentucky, in reply to the argument of novelty against the tax, said, that this had been frequently called the age of experiments. Our Government itself was a novelty, which had established its utility; and there were many novelties as well of invention as policy, in our country, which reflected on it the highest honor; and he hoped this would be attended with the same result.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, opposed the tax on furniture, principally on account of its difficulty, if not impracticability, of collection, as opening the door to fraud, perjury, and favoritism.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, on the same side of the question, said he was opposed in principle to the tax, which he believed would not produce anything like the estimated amount. He wished to dispense with this tax, and add the amount of it to the direct tax, or lay it on other articles.

Mr. EPPES rose to defend this tax. He had no idea, when the United States had for years collected a revenue from imports of twenty millions of dollars, on the oaths of the merchants, that they could not collect a tax of a million of dollars from property to be valued on the oaths of the possessors. As to the tax discouraging matrimony, and consequently population, he denied this operation to it; because beds, blankets, sheets, and every article essential to these objects, were exempted from taxation. He denied the inequality and oppressiveness of the tax. Its novelty was an objection, which would equally apply to various others, all internal taxes being new to the Government. It was a tax the rich would pay, and the poor be exempt from; and, therefore, he was in favor of it.

Mr. POST stated that, in collecting the duties on imports, there was a collateral examination of goods entered to verify the statement made on oath; so that the gentleman was mistaken in likening the mode of collection proposed to that existing in relation to import duties. Mr. P. again insisted on the propriety of laying the whole amount of tax on the direct and distillation tax.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, spoke a few words in explanation, and Mr. EPPES replied.

The House then decided on Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's motion, as follows: For the motion 51, against it 69.

So the Committee determined to retain the tax proposed to be laid on furniture.

Mr. OAKLEY moved to strike out the duty on tallow candles in the hands of the manufacturer. He conceived the tax would be rendered nugatory by the increase of domestic manufacture, and the very poorest people only, those who are unable to purchase materials for making candles, will pay the tax.

The motion was negatived—40 only rising in favor of it, 66 against it.

Mr. BIGELOW, of Massachusetts, moved to strike out the article of leather. His objection was that leather was an article of first necessity, of which the poor consumed nearly as much as the rich, and which, therefore, ought not to be taxed.

The motion was negatived—30 only rising in favor of it.

The question on the resolution, as amended, was then decided in the affirmative.

The next and last resolution was in the following words:

Resolved, That it is expedient to establish a National Bank, with branches in the several States."

The House decided on this question without debate: For the resolution 66, against it 40.

The Committee then reported the several resolutions as agreed to, with the amendments made thereto.

The resolution for increasing the direct tax came up for concurrence. The resolution, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, proposes to add 100 per cent. to the present amount of the direct tax.

Mr. OAKLEY moved to amend the resolve, by inserting one hundred and fifty in lieu of one hundred, so as to make the present amount of that tax 150 per cent.; in other words, to lay a direct tax for the ensuing year of seven and a half millions.

This motion was negatived: For the motion 20, against it 116, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chappell, Cilley, Dana, Fisk of New York, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Ingersoll, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Oakley, Post, Potter, Rich, Seybert, Sherwood, Skinner, Taylor, and Thompson.

NAYS—Messrs. So Mr. OAKLEY's motion was lost.

On the question to concur with the Committee in amending the resolution, so as to increase the direct tax 100 per cent. on its present amount, making the total direct tax to be raised six millions of dollars—

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, opposed the tax, on the ground that the country was not adequate to pay it without oppression, if not absolute destruction.

The question on inserting 100 per cent. in lieu of 50, was decided as follows: For the amendment 100, against it 38, as follows:

The question then being on agreeing to the resolution as amended, going to increase the present direct tax, as before stated, and the yeas and nays having been demanded thereon—

MR. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, said, the proposition was to grant a new land tax, of twice the amount of the last. Before he gave his vote, he wished to be permitted to state the reasons which would govern and decide it. It had often happened that public bodies, or the majorities in public bodies, having the general power of adopting laws and resolutions binding on and controlling the whole, had supposed themselves capable of reducing dissenting members to a situation, in which any course of conduct pursued by them might be liable to unfavorable construction. But cases of this sort, attended with real difficulty, he thought to be rare. At any rate, the present occasion presented no such difficulty.

He did not feel himself under the necessity, either of obstructing the passage of the taxes through the House, or of taking upon himself any portion of the responsibility of laying them. A case might arise, in which it would rest with those who have been in the minority of the House, on leading measures of Government, to say whether the supplies should be granted or withheld. Whenever such a condition of things shall happen, it will bring its own rule of action along with it. At present, no such case exists. It is not put to us who opposed the war in its origin, and have steadily reprobated the manner in which it has been prosecuted, to say now, whether a burdensome system of taxes shall be imposed on the people to replenish the exhausted Treasury. That is for those to determine, who have made the taxes necessary. Our votes are not asked for now, any more than they were upon the declaration of hostilities. It was not then left for us to say, whether there should be war. It is not left with us now to say, whether there shall be taxes. Those who took upon themselves the responsibility of the first, must bear also the responsibility of the last. And it must be presumed, that gentlemen are ready and willing to sustain the consequences of their own measures. Whoever has power to grant revenue, has also the power of directing its expenditure; and if the question of supplies or no supplies, should ever come to rest on the decision of those who have heretofore differed in opinion from the course pursued by the Administration, they then will be able to accompany the supplies with such other measures as shall insure the appropriation of the revenue to proper objects, and place its expenditure in competent hands. But if we were now to say, we will vote for the taxes, if the Administration will apply the means which we shall grant it, to proper and sensible objects, and will call to its aid, in this exigency of affairs, the most prominent men in the nation, without regard to political party or connexion, we should be told—"Gentlemen, 'you are very obliging, but we happen to be able to carry through our taxes upon our own strength. 'We do not choose to submit to such terms and 'limitations as you propose, and must beg leave, 'therefore, to dispense both with your conditions 'and your votes."

If, he said, the taxes depended on his vote; if the Administration could show it had made fair and reasonable offers for peace, which the enemy had refused; if it would now consent to apply its means to the first great object of all Governments, the protection of the people, to carry on the war in a manner agreeable to the common sense of the community, and would endeavour to call forth the talents of the nation to aid the cause of the nation, most assuredly he should vote for whatever supplies the occasion called for. He should only be anxious in such a case to grant enough; because he did not represent those who would weigh, very scrupulously, essential national rights and national security against the price necessary for their preservation. But as no such change of system is intimated, and as the system of taxation now proposed does not depend at all for adoption or rejection on his vote, he should hardly give what might be deemed a sanction to the measures of Government, by a general and voluntary support of its present plans of finance. At the same time he did not see that other gentlemen, equally opposed to the war with himself, and expecting as little as he did any successful issue to it, without a change, might not, nevertheless, deem the present exigency to be one, in which they were at liberty, if they so should choose, to vote for revenue, without making themselves in any degree answerable for its probable misapplication. The whole responsibility, he thought, belonged to the other side of the House. They had undertaken both to put the country into a state of war, and to get it well out again. In the former, they had succeeded; how well they will be able to perform the latter, time would show.

If it was said, continued MR. W., that, public credit depends on adopting this system of taxes, and that it cannot be refused without refusing the means of restoring public credit, he certainly hoped that gentlemen would adopt that system of finance which suited them best, as well for the restoration of the public credit, as for other purposes of Government. He did not wish to limit their choice. He only disclaimed any share in the responsibility of measures, in the production of which those whose political opinions he respected had no concern. A high public credit was one of the treasures which the country had committed to the hands of the present Administration. How they are to restore it, buried as it now is under a mass of depreciated stocks, unfilled loans, discredited Treasury notes, debts unpaid and debts unliquidated, they must determine for themselves, looking to that account to which the country may call them.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

It was worth our while to inquire, how it has happened that public credit has received such a tremendous shock. Whose is the fault? When those measures were begun, which have at length brought us where we now are, the public credit of the United States was as high as that of any nation on earth. To whom are imputable the shame and disgrace of its prostration and fall? To what is it owing? Not to any deficiency in the national resources to sustain the credit of the Government. Both the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee of Ways and Means tell us, and they tell us truly, that the real means of the nation have been abundant. If then, the Administration received the public credit in a high and honorable condition; if the nation has at all times possessed the means of keeping it so, and the Administration has possessed, as it has, a sufficient control of these means; and if after all, the public credit has gone to fearful wreck and ruin, who alone is answerable for such a state of things? or who can refer our present condition to any other cause than an incompetent management of the powers of Government? The basis of public credit is confidence in the national resources, in the duration and stability of Government, and in the competency and character of those who administer it. It is owing to no distrust of the resources of the nation, nor of the general organization and structure of the Government, that the public credit had sunk so low. The true cause of this was to be sought elsewhere. No system of taxation, merely as such, will prove an adequate remedy, especially at this late hour. Unless the Administration can court back a general confidence, not only in the wealth of the nation, but also in its own ability and the wisdom and fitness of its own measures, public credit has gone far beyond its grasp.

As to a more able or successful prosecution of the war, he professed not to be sanguine in that hope. That the people will defend themselves, with spirit, whenever attacked, admits no doubt; but as far as the prosecution of the war rests with the Government, he despaired of any change in the manner, or any difference in the result. The Administration appeared to him not to have changed its habits. It continued to go on in its old party path—to revolve round its party centre, and to draw all its heat and its light, its animation and its being, from party sources. The measure of ability with which the war had been conducted, was about equal to the measure of prudence with which it was declared; and the success of the issue, without a change of auspices, would probably be proportionate to both.

He had been struck with a paragraph in Mr. Jefferson's late letter. Speaking of the invasion of this place by the enemy, he says, he took advantage of this nation unarmed and unprepared. For the partial judgment of a friend, this is sufficiently severe. The Government took its own time to go to war. It invited the enemy to the conflict. It is attacked, two years afterward, in the centre of the nation, on the very threshold of the Capitol, and even there is found unarmed and unprepared.

The Government was indeed unprepared when it went to war. It has been unprepared ever since; and if the contest should not last more than twice as long as the war of the Greeks and the Trojans, it will come to an end, before the country, upon the present system of things, will be prepared for its beginning.

A state of mere unpreparedness, however, was not exactly the whole of our case, when war was declared. There was something in it worse than that, even aside from the character of the war itself, and the opinion which one half the nation had of it.

The country had had commerce, the abundant source of its revenue. A barbarous and unrelenting series of acts of self-murder, called restrictions, had put an end to that commerce. It had had a sinking fund, containing the sustaining, redeeming principles of public credit. This was abandoned. It had an useful National Banking Institution, with solid capital and on sound principles; and which had proved itself, by twenty years experience, to be capable of offering the most important facilities to the operations of finance. This also was destroyed. Having made these provisions for revenue, for public credit, and financial operations, the Government felt itself in a condition to invite a war.

From such a beginning, what else could be expected than we have seen to happen? While it remained on our part a war of invasion, nothing was done; and now, when in turn we are attacked by the enemy, the defence of the country rests on the people and on the States, almost unassisted by the aid of Government. In what quarter of the country does the Government afford efficient protection to the people? In most assailable places, the States are obliged to call out their militia upon their own responsibility, and the strength of their own resources; and here, at the heart of the nation, a force of five thousand men has routed and dispersed the Government, and scattered the ashes of the Capitol over the soil which claimed its peculiar and exclusive protection. He had said last session, and he repeated it now, that the Government had failed in the discharge of its first great duty—the main object of all Governments—the protection of the people.

He wished also the House and the country to consider how we stood with all the neutral Powers of Europe in relation to this war. It had been said by his honorable friend from New York (Mr. OAKLEY) that the ears of the European Courts were shut against us. He believed this to be perfectly true. The Administration itself knew better than any individual that it had not been able to excite the sympathies of a single Power in Europe, in its favor, on the subject of this war. The reason was obvious. The nations of Europe had seen the part this Government had acted. They had seen it come in, in the moment of European extremity and agony, and take part on the side of an always detested and now fallen tyranny. Without discussing the question, of no importance to them, whether the measures of this Government grew out of a previous stipulation, signed and sealed, and interchanged with that of France, or whether in these measures it had acted gratuitously, and only followed the bent of its own inclination, they could not but take notice of the fact, that these measures were brought into play precisely at the moment when they were most likely to aid in the overthrow of the Governments, and the subjugation of the nations of Europe. It was difficult, he thought, to restrain one's indignation on this subject. If anything could make one ashamed of his country, it would be that its Government had been capable of acting such a part. How different would our situation be at this time, if the Government could say to England: "We have interfered in none of your European quarrels. We have sought to take no advantage of the pressure of your circumstances. A Republic, ourselves, and attached to the principles of political liberty, we have lent neither aid nor countenance to any projects formed against the general liberty or prosperity of Europe. We have held a course strictly and scrupulously impartial; and for proof of the correctness of our conduct in all these respects, we refer to the unbiassed judgment of neutral nations. We appeal to those who have been with you through the struggle which has now terminated, whether they suspect us of having had any leaning or partiality towards your "common enemy."

As to the negotiation and the terms of peace offered by England, Mr. W. said it would not be supposed that those who opposed the war as unnecessary and ruinous, were on that account to consent to any other than fair and honorable terms of peace. They held the Administration answerable for an honorable peace. The country's honor was unblemished, when they took the guardianship of its concerns, and it would be required at their hands equally unblemished. For one, he said, in no crisis, in no emergency, in no distress of national affairs, would he consent to a peace which should inflict a wound on the true honor or substantial interests of the country. But he did not affect to conceal his opinion; he wished, rather, on all proper occasions, to express it, that there was no chance of coercing England, or even of defending the country successfully, until the power and strength of the nation should be called forth, and guided by different hands. He wished, at the same time, to express his regret, that the American Commissioners had not proposed their terms of peace. He wished they had stated explicitly, whether the Government of this country had or had not given up the grounds upon which it originally went to war. If the British Commissioners looked for extravagant terms to be proposed by ours, it was not very unnatural that they should set out with terms as extravagant themselves. It is to be lamented, that having found out what were the terms of England, our Ministers did not propose their own terms. to the end that the world might see the difference. It may be a question fit for casuists, which partakes least of a pacific temper and moderate views, to propose terms of peace, which are deemed inadmissible, as was done by England, or to propose no terms at all, as was done by ourselves. If the American Ministers were instructed to make peace on fair and reasonable terms, it cannot be too much regretted that they did not make those terms known; because, in order to put the enemy completely in the wrong, it is necessary to show, not only that his terms were extravagant, but that ours were not so.

The publication of the documents here is relied on to satisfy the people of this country of the equity and moderation of the views of the Cabinet. If it should answer that purpose, still it does not answer the other, of making known its equity and moderation to England. Because, until now, that they are published here, England had no means of knowing the instructions given to our Ministers. She could only know that if you insisted now, on what you demanded when you went to war, your terms, in her estimation, were as inadmissible as hers are in yours.

But will the publication of parts of these instructions satisfy the people of this country that the Government has made fair terms of peace? If anything was published, why not the whole? If the part concealed is not material, why conceal it? In cases of this sort, it is obvious, that whatever has been previously done, may be undone by something subsequent. It is not like a series of correspondence between different parties. Unless the Government publishes the whole in this case it may as well publish nothing.

Mr. W. said he did not underrate the difficulties of the present crisis. He was well aware of all these difficulties. But he would not say, because he did not think that they were at all insurmountable with a wise and able Administration of Government. But it did appear to him, that the country had committed itself into the hands of men not likely to make peace, nor competent to conduct the war. This, he thought, our greatest difficulty, and he believed the nation would come to the same opinion.

In the meantime he should not obstruct; he should only hold himself at liberty not to approve, without reason, the course pursued. It could not be said, then, that the Administration was asked to do its duty while the means are refused; means will not be refused so far as they depend on measures here. Its measures will be carried here, and as far as the aid of this House can go, it will have it. But he should not give his vote for the measures proposed, either by way of expressing his approbation of the past, or his expectations for the future. On the past he looked with mixed emotions of indignation and grief; on the future with fearful forebodings and apprehensions, relieved only by the hope that the immediate adoption of better counsels might lead to better times.

When Mr. W. had concluded, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, October 25.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, notifying that they insist on their amendments to the resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Major General Brown, Major General Scott, and Brigadiers Ripley, Miller, Porter, Gaines, and Macomb," and asking a conference thereon: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House agree to the conference asked by the Senate, and that Mr. TROUP, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. STUART, be the managers at the same on their part.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the report of the Committee of Ways and Means recommending the imposition of additional taxes; and the first resolution, for adding 100 per cent. to the present amount of the direct taxes, being on its passage—

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, spoke at length in support of the resolve, and in reply to Mr. WEBSTER's speech of yesterday.

Mr. CALHOUN said, he did not rise to consider whether the war was originally just and necessary; or whether the Administration had abandoned the original objects of the contest; much less, whether the Opposition, according to the very modest declaration of the member from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) possessed all of the talent and confidence of the country. His object was to call the attention of this House to the necessity of prompt and vigorous measures for the prosecution of the war. If ever a body of men held the destinies of a country in their hands, it was that which he was now addressing. You have for an enemy a Power the most implacable and formidable; who, now freed from any other contest, will, the very next campaign, direct the whole of his force against you. Besides his deep rooted enmity against this country, which will urge him to exertion, the enemy is aware of the necessity, on his part, to bring the contest to a speedy termination. He dreads its continuance; for he well knows, that should it be maintained by us with vigor, for only a few years, there will be other parties to the struggle, which may again involve him in a war with all Europe. He then will put forth, from spite and policy, the whole of his strength the very next Summer, to crush us if possible by one mighty effort. To meet this state of things, the whole of the resources will have to be called into action; and, what is of equal importance, with such promptitude as to be ready to act as soon as the season will admit. What then are the duties which devolve on this House, and which must be performed in order that we may be in a state of desirable preparation to meet and maintain the struggle? This is the question which he proposed to consider, not indeed in detail, or with great accuracy; but generally, in order that we may be aware of the urgent necessity for despatch. First, then, it will be absolutely necessary to pass these resolutions, or some others of equal vigor, into laws. Our finances it is acknowledged are much deranged; and it is also admitted, on all sides, that they can only be restored by a vigorous system of taxes. Has any member estimated how much time this will consume. It is now the 25th of October, and we have not passed even the resolutions; at the same rate of proceeding, to settle all the complexity of the detail of bills, and pass them into laws, will require months. In the next place, it will be necessary (he presumed no member could doubt it) to take the state of the circulating medium into consideration; and to devise some measure to render it more safe, and adapted to the purposes of finance. The single fact, that we have no proper medium, commensurate in its circulation with the Union—that it is all local—is calculated to produce much embarrassment in the operation of the Treasury. But, sir, after we have passed the taxes and established an adequate circulating medium, which must of necessity, with the closest attention, consume much time; much still will remain to be done. The Army, to which the President has so strongly called our attention, has not yet claimed a moment of our time. He would not pretend to anticipate the plan which the Military Committee would doubtless submit to this House, but he would state what appeared to him indispensable to give the greatest effect, with the most economy, to our arms. He did not wish to be understood parsimony, but that which gave to the amount expended the greatest effect.

The enemy at present presses the war both on our seaboard and interior frontier. The nature of the war on either, will, if properly considered, indicate the mode, that it ought to be met and resisted. On the seaboard it must be strictly defensive. The enemy can make no permanent conquest of any importance there; but he hopes, by alarming and harassing the country, and putting us to an enormous expense in defending it, to break the spirit of the nation, and bring it to his own terms. The only remedy in our hand, without a marching force, is to fortify as strongly as possible the cities and exposed points; and to garrison them with a sufficient number of experienced regular troops. In case of an attack, they are to be aided by militia of the cities and adjacent country, called out on the occasion en masse which can be done without much vexation or expense. It is thus by having respectable garrisons of regular troops, aided as he has stated, and supported by strong works, we will afford more security, and will save millions of expense. The present militia force he supposed, in actual service, could not be much short of one hundred thousand. Less that half that number of regulars could be made abundantly adequate to the defence of our seaboard.

On the Canada frontier the war must assume an opposite character. If we wish to act with effect, it must there be wholly offensive. He did hope the miserably stale and absurd objections against offensive operations in Canada had ceased, till he heard yesterday the member from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER.) It was so obviously the cheapest and most effectual mode of operating on our enemy, that thinking men, he believed, with little exception, of all parties, had agreed in its expediency. For, suppose that we should have at the opening of the next campaign a sufficient force on the Canada frontier for its reduction; and what would then be the result? Either our enemy must call off the whole of his force to defend himself in that quarter, or he must permit it to fall into our possession. Either event would be desirable. If the enemy should adopt the former, as in all probability he would be compelled to do, our seaboard would be freed from danger and alarm, and we would have the further advantage of meeting him on equal terms. He would no longer be aided by his maritime superiority. If, however, he should not strengthen himself in Canada, but continue the war on the coast, it would be still more to our advantage. The reduction of his possessions, besides shedding a glory on our arms, and producing both here and in England the happiest effects in our favor, would enable us to maintain the struggle with half the expense in men and money. After so desirable an event our efforts might be almost exclusively directed to the defence of the seaboard, and the war would assume a new aspect highly favorable to this country.

To cause so desirable a state of things, a regular force of at least fifty thousand men ought to be ready to act against Canada by the first of May or June, at farthest. If they could be immediately raised and marched to their proper depots for training, they could in a few months be well trained for service. He was well assured that the brilliant battles of Bridgewater and Chipewa were won by men, three-fourths of whom had not been in the ranks more than four months. With skilful officers, and with the aptitude of the Americans to acquire the military art, the finest army in a few months might be formed. He said, he could not refrain from congratulating this House and country on the acquisition we had made, in so short a time, of military skill. It was wonderful, almost incredible, that in a year or two, with very little opportunity, such Generals should be found as have the last Summer led our Army to glory. No country, under all of these circumstances, ever in so short a time developed so much military talent. Put under their command without delay a sufficient force, well appointed, and you will then find yourselves in the road to honor and secure peace. But, can this be done by idle debate, by discussing the origin of the war, and the relative talent and virtue of the two great parties in this country? Now is our time, not for debate, but action. Much is to be done. We have not a moment to lose. Time is to us everything, men, money, honor, glory, and peace. Should we consume it in debate, and let the moments for preparation glide away, our affairs must be irretrievably ruined. Compare what remains to be done with the time for action, and it is certain, that to act promptly is as important as to act at all. Under these impressions, he hoped that the House would pass this day on all the resolutions; and that they would be referred back to the Committee to report bills immediately; and that whatever was needful to our early and complete preparation, would be promptly despatched. The enemy is already arrived, and, as soon as permitted by the season, will strike with deadly intention; let us be ready to receive and return the blow with redoubled force. We are placed in circumstances the most urgent and imperious. Our supposed weakness has tempted the enemy to make his extraordinary demands. Who that bears the heart of an American can think of them without the most just indignation? Surrender the Lakes to his control; renounce the fisheries, that nursery for seamen; cede a part of Maine, and all beyond the Greenville line, and recognise the Indians as their allies, and under their protection. Such is his language. He relies not so much on his own strength as our weakness and disunion. Let it be our most serious business, by vigor and promptitude, to baffle and destroy his vain hopes. If we fail, it will not be for the want of means, but because we have not used them. We have generals and troops that have proved themselves an over match for the choicest of the enemy's battalions, commanded by her most boasted officers. To this evidence of skill and courage, superadd preparations on our part equal to our resources; by this means you will make him sensible of his presumption, and listen to terms of peace honorable to both nations. He has it in his power at all times to make such a peace. Every member who hears me, knows this to be the fact, notwithstanding the unjust and unfounded insinuations of the member from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) to the contrary. He observed again, that England dreaded a continuance of the contest. The affairs of Europe are far from being settled. Her relation in a commercial point of view is calculated to raise up powerful enemies on the Continent. Should she be foiled and disgraced here, which she must be if we but do our duty, the opportunity so favorable to humble her will be seized. Of these facts she is sensible; and our very preparation for a vigorous war will make her dread the contest. But, suppose, instead of vigorous and prompt preparation, we consume our time in debate here, and permit our affairs to go on in the consequent slow and feeble way. Where is the man so blind as to believe that England will limit her views

The Ways and Means.

by her present demands, as extravagant as they are? We are already told, that she will proportion her future demands to the relative situation of the two countries. She neither expected nor desired peace on the terms which were offered. Her bosom is repossessed with the ambition and projects that inspired her in the year '76. It is the war of the Revolution revived; we are again struggling for our liberty and independence. The enemy stands ready, and eagerly watches to seize any opportunity which our feebleness or division may present, to realize his gigantic schemes of conquest. In this struggle for existence, he must entreat the members of the Opposition, though they can reconcile it to their conscience to stand with folded arms and coldly look on, not to impede by idle and frivolous debate the efforts of those who are ready by every sacrifice to maintain the independence of the country. The subject is weighty; he felt himself pressed on all sides by the most interesting topics; but he would abstain from further observation, lest he who admonished against the consumption of the time of the House in long debate, should set an example of it in himself. The time is precious. He felt that he owed an apology for consuming so much as he had done.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, spoke briefly in explanation.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, in his usual pointed manner assigned the reason which induced him to vote for the increased tax.

Mr. SHIPHERD addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, although we have been solemnly admonished, by a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) to waste no more time in idle debate, as he is pleased to call the arguments on the question before the House, you will pardon me if I venture yet to exercise the privilege of the Representative of a free people, and frankly express my reasons for the vote I shall give against the resolution before you. The question, sir, is a momentous one, and ought not to be hurried. To dash into a measure so interesting to our constituents without deliberation, would be rash and imprudent.

If the convictions of my mind would permit, I should most cordially vote in this case with the majority. Had their side of the question the least perceptible advantage, nothing would give me more pleasure than to add a vote to their number. For, sir, I declare most sincerely and truly, that any opposition of mine, is from no desire to give new asperity to party animosity. Fain would I hush its bickerings, and, if possible, drive the fiend from our country, and extinguish her torch.

No man, more than myself, can wish to conciliate, and, in the patriotic desire to save the country from ruin, lose forever those prejudices which have long been an evil deeply to be lamented. Fain would I, if possible, convince the majority by a cordial co-operation when they are right, and a dispassionate opposition when wrong, of a disposition, on our part, to seek and promote the welfare of the nation, and to support any discreet measure whether it shall come from this or that side of the House.

Sir, gentlemen ought not to resent opposition. The dearest and strongest convictions may impel the legislator zealously to resist what a majority may as sincerely think right. Members of the same party think and vote differently on particular questions, and yet it is productive of no resentments.

Such, sir, ought to be our charity towards those who oppose even our most favorite objects, especially if they are in the least doubtful, as to believe they act from a sense of duty, unless we have sufficient evidence of a different disposition. Indiscriminate condemnation of the motives of an antagonist is certainly no less than odious intolerance, which must be avoided, to perpetuate the blessings of freedom.

But, sir, however strong I may desire union and a perfect good understanding between the different sides of this House, an aberration from duty, or the abandonment of an opinion formed after a long and deliberate examination of the subject, would be a sacrifice too great, and therefore cannot be made. From such examination I have formed an opinion, and therefore proceed to give this House the view I have taken of the subject.

It is said by gentlemen on the other side, in substance, that the Treasury is without money, Government without credit, and the armies without men. That the Union is in danger, and, unless prompt and sufficient aids are furnished by the Legislature, we shall be ruined. To this statement of facts I subscribe. The evidences are too strong to be doubted; and, because such is the state of the nation, am I opposed to the resolution, and the reasons urged for an affirmative vote will induce me to give a negative. If we are ruined, who has been the despoiler? Surely it cannot be charged upon those who, for fourteen years, have been deprived of the means of doing good or evil to the Government; men who have been declared unworthy to participate in the administration of our public affairs. Sir, it must be charged to your public agents as having produced this mighty ruin.

There was a time, Mr. Speaker, when the Government was wisely administered, and the speedy fruits were fame, wealth, peace, and prosperity, to the Government and people.

The Union was a splendid luminary, whose light attracted the attention, and excited the admiration, of the civilized world. The surest earnest of permanency and stability seemed to be given, and we fondly thought that remote generations would partake of the blessings of our admired institutions.

When the power was wrested from the men of other times, the Treasury was full, our credit was high, and the revenue annually increasing. No calamities, no evils, either existed or threatened to impede the nation in the career of prosperity. Every class of citizens felt the happy influence of a free Government, administered with wisdom and benignity.

The glory of those times appears more conspicuous, contrasted with the gloom and misery of the present. And the wisdom which had framed the Government, and given it motion and direction, was so powerful and correct, that for years it endured the hard service of novel and ruinous experiment; and, for aught we know, might have continued, had not the way of success been blocked up, and the Government jostled from its original course.

If, then, sir, the high officers of the nation have so managed our political concerns, as to sink us from a proud and lofty station to the very depths of poverty and disgrace, dry up the sources of revenue, load it with debt, and make us contemptible in our own and the eyes of the nations, it becomes us well to examine, and seriously to inquire whether it will be prudent to burden our constituents with oppressive taxes; vainly hoping to retrieve our lost credit by replenishing our empty Treasury, to be laid out under the agency of the very men who have given us so many sad examples of a destitution of those qualities which only ought to invite confidence.

Where is our guarantee that the money forced from our suffering fellow-citizens, will be expended with less prodigality than the millions which have been squandered in unavailing experiments or lavished upon worthless men? Will it be denied, that the country swarms with such, and that they have been too much the favorites of power for the interest of the grand community?

If a pledge of reformation can or is to be given, let us see it. Convince us that the Executive has become trustworthy, and obtain the united confidence of the House. But, sir, we are to have no such pledge, not even a promise; on the contrary, the same phantoms are to be chased, the same ruinous measures to be adopted, and this is openly avowed upon this floor. We, therefore, are not permitted to hope for a change, or even conjecture that new measures may produce a new and happy result. Nothing before us but an obstinate determination to persist in that course, the end of which is inevitable ruin.

Mr. Speaker, it is fair and correct to calculate from what has been, what will be the effect of the same causes, and therefore, from experience, ought we to judge of the fitness of any proposition, more especially when a nation's interests, a nation's salvation, is depending. It is high time to dismiss the dreams and visions that have bewildered and led us astray. From the past, let us, as we love our country, look to the future, and, guided by this sure index, determine. In the exercise of sober sense, ask ourselves whether we can, with a due regard to the interests of this much injured nation, call upon it so loudly. To me this subject appears big with importance. The consequences may yet be lamented.

It must require a faith not imposed, a charity which would savor more of weakness than piety, to believe or anticipate a renewing spirit hereafter to prevail in the management of our pecuniary concerns, so long as the managers remain unaltered. There is no demonstration more clear than that, under the charge of the men who have wasted the public finances and destroyed your credit, your country will sink deeper and deeper in ruin.

If the majority, sir, possessed any inclination to cheer the desponding hopes of the nation or brighten its prospects, and thereby invite the confidence and co-operation of the minority, their President would give some token that he had abandoned the old and ruinous course, and designed to seek one, new and more promising. He would even now have emptied his Cabinet of a group of deluded and deluding Ministers, by whom he has been misled, whose conduct has palpably proved a defect of head or heart, or both, and replenished it with the first choice of the States, regardless of party distinction. But, sir, he has seen the ship sinking, and retains, in despite of the most awful premonitions, the same pilot and helmsman. Permit me, sir, to enforce the observations already made, and those which may be made, by example, and then judge of the Chief of your Government.

The example remains a monument of disgrace to this metropolis. Look at the walls of your once magnificent Capitol. Where now is all its grandeur, its lofty arches and proud columns with the costly garnishing that delighted the eye, and afforded ease, convenience, and elegance, to the Representatives of the people?

They are gone, and what remains is a striking proof of the impotence, the folly, not to say cowardice, of the men, who, had they been as they ought to have been, would have abandoned, only with life or liberty, this ornament of your city to the torches of your enemy. But unresisted, undisturbed, the hated foe was permitted to destroy the very Hall where, but about two years before, this proud boast was vauntingly made, "My word for it, if you will declare war, in six months the Canadas will be ours." Yes, sir, to the disgrace of our country, the very Hall where the question of peace and war was debated, and the declaration of the latter was solemnly adopted, fell a sacrifice to the enemy who were so contemptibly thought of.

Permit me also, sir, to present you the palace of your President in flames, or, if you please, its yawning ruins, and the offices of State, and above all your navy yard, and the ashes of the frigate and sloop-of-war; and, lastly, your President, Secretary of War, of the Navy, the Commanding General, and seven thousand men, flying before a handful of marauding British, worn down with fatigue and melted with heat. And, sir, we are now asked with the most earnest importunity to intrust these men who gave up to certain destruction this immense property, without even an effort to save it, with twenty-one or two millions of dollars more. The destruction of the navy yard was such an act of imprudence that it indicated lunacy. Not content with the firebrand of the enemy, perhaps praying that his ruthless hand might spare some part of the public property, the high officer, whose duty it was to protect it, orders it all to be burned.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

Military gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, say all this vast property might have been defended, together with this city. Why burn the navy yard? Why the sloop-of-war, which had her guns on board and prepared for action, and might have been used to defend the place where she was built; and as a last resort could have been saved by choosing the middle or eastern shore of the Potomac?

But no, she must be burned. The frigate on the stocks, together with the immense property of the excellent establishment at the navy yard, must all be devoted to the indiscretion of the honorable Secretary. No one, sir, will pretend to say that this property could have been carried off or used by the enemy. Steam engines, forges, workshops, sawmills, and vessels, are not convenient for a knapsack, or even a baggage wagon. Why then burn this necessary and valuable property?

It is answered, it was burned to prevent the enemy from taking it. Supposing they had done so, it is certain they could have done no more than destroyed it; they might, it is true, have so done, and probably would, if no attempt was made to defend it. A few more heroic souls, however, like Barney and Miller, would unquestionably have taught your enemy, by experience sad and fatal to them, that the rights and property of the nation were not to be infringed with impunity.

But supposing the worst, that the enemy had done the same that was done in pursuance of the Secretary's peremptory order, and had burned this admirable establishment; in point of property, the loss to the nation would have been no greater; in point of character, infinitely better. And, after a faithful experiment, if we had failed, it was but to abandon it to the invaders to spare or destroy at their election. Hence, sir, it is most obvious that there was no necessity of committing this detestable suicide.

Here it may be asked, how this reasoning concerns the subject before the House? I will show you, sir, in a few words, that your Chief Magistrate in particular is responsible for this shameful transaction. He, his Secretary of War, and of the Navy, were on the field of battle, or rather of flight. Was it then by their orders or the order of either of them, that the metropolis was cowardly given up to be sacked by an enemy not one-third of the number of our troops? And whether this base desertion was caused by either the one or the other of the three, or the Commanding General, in either case your President, sir, is responsible to the nation for the loss and disgrace attached to the transaction. How? If it was by his order, then he is answerable directly. If by either of the pair of Secretaries, then it became him, indeed it was an indispensable duty, to have inquired, and dismissed from office the man whose examples proved him unworthy of his station. If it was from the mere motion of the Commanding General, he should have caused an immediate arrest, tried and punished him for disgracing his nation and office. A severe sentence was pronounced against General Hull for cowardice, and his surely was a venial transaction compared with the flight from Bladensburg.

I would not be understood as charging General Winder with unmilitary conduct. I had ever supposed him a brave and honorable man, and without more proof I wish still so to consider him; and for the sake of this argument it is immaterial whether he is guilty or innocent. In either case your President must be answerable. That some one is guilty cannot be doubted, and it behooved the President to seek redress for the nation who had entrusted him with the prerogatives of his exalted station. Now, sir, let us inquire what was done to satisfy the loud claims of an injured people; what to retrieve their lost honor? Nothing—just nothing. It is true a proclamation was issued, and the enemy “vandalized” with sufficient heat and asperity; but the Secretary of War, who had become so odious to the people that a universal murmur of discontent was heard in every direction, and whose infamy is attested with chalk and charcoal in rude prose and verse upon the solitary walls of your Capitol, was solicited, entreated by the President still to retain his office. He could not endure the thought of parting with his dear friend—this precious officer.

You have, sir, already been pointed to the destruction of the navy yard. It is presumed no one doubts that the Secretary of the Navy ordered this destruction; an indiscretion, to say the least, so extraordinary that not a single apologist can be found to excuse or justify the transaction. Well, sir, where is he; dismissed from office as not trustworthy? No, sir; but hasking in the smiles of the President—not a whisper from his lips disapproving the act.

If the Commanding General was guilty, where is he? Still in favor without inquiry and without censure.

If it is the unyielding determination of the President to retain such men in office, to suffer the country to be disgraced without requiring satisfaction from, or inflicting punishment upon, the authors, what, sir, is there left to encourage the people to shed their blood or pay their money in a cause that affords not a ray of hope? The heart sinks with despondence at the prospect.

We are asked with emphasis, “Will you suffer the enemy to overrun the country without opposition, jeopardize the Union, and submit to recolonization? Will you unnerve the arm of Government by withholding men and money for defence?” Sir, could we believe that voting men and money would produce the promised effect there would be a sufficient inducement to the minority to afford every encouragement towards the support of the common cause. Had we but reasonable grounds to hope that the money would be expended to save the country, for one I should feel it a duty to contribute my feeble aid in furnishing the Administration with cash and character. The minority possess as ardent desires to serve and ennoble their country as can be felt on the other side; but examples—actions that speak louder than promises—demonstrate the certainty, if men and money should be voted, of a failure of the desired object. The regular armies are not intended by the men in power for defence, and the money will not be expended for that purpose. If the Capitol of the nation, the offices of State, indeed the palace of the President, were given up by the high officers, who were present, to ravage and conflagration, without an attempt to defend them, what reason have we to believe that other parts of the Union, less dear and interesting to the Cabinet, are to find in our armies a more prompt and effectual shield? Where, sir, is the benefit in building ships of war, if our own torches are to burn them before they leave the ways or harbors where they were launched? But our country must and will be defended, and to reason from facts, not by the armies under the control of your President, but by the militia of the States; not by the money we may here vote to levy upon our suffering fellow-citizens, but at the expense of the States. Look, sir, at the examples before you since the commencement of hostilities and see how many instances of defence can be found from regular troops. Detroit had regulars, but no defence at the Niagara frontier, Sackett's Harbor, the seaboard in the South, Baltimore. In the Eastern States the militia have almost alone opposed their breasts to an invading enemy; and at New London they not only defended the State, but your vessels of war.

At Plattsburg you have had a striking comment upon the text. While the enemy, sir, with a formidable army hovered upon the frontier line, General Izard, by whose order I know not, drew off about four thousand of the regulars, and left, says the official account, but fifteen hundred, to oppose Governor Prevost with fourteen thousand. A place where our fleet, if necessary, might have been protected, and where, when no enemy, a large regular army was stationed, was instantly abandoned when the enemy began to approach; and while the hosts of General Izard were marching South from the field of danger, the militia were marching North towards it; and while this regular army were enjoying the scene at Lake George, a place of fashionable resort, or admiring the stupendous scenery at Glenn's Falls, the militia were fighting the British upon the banks of Saranac; and this same General Izard and army passed through Sackett's Harbor, to give another opportunity to the militia, if invaded, to show how capable they were of defending their country. Add to all this, the General Government have refused to indemnify Massachusetts the expense of defence by her militia.

New York is garrisoned principally by militia, and the city has obtained by loan a million of dollars to defray the expenses. Whether the Government will ultimately reimburse them this large sum, remains to be known.

This, sir, is the state of the country. Such is the conduct of men who guide its destinies; therefore I beg to be forgiven if I withhold my confidence from them, and my vote to furnish them with means not to be used for defence, but, for I know not what new and idle scheme that may strike the infatuated mind.

One of the first objects of the Union, was the more effectual protection of the States; and while they engaged to pour their wealth into the coffers of the General Government, the Government undertook to reciprocate the contribution, by affording the arms of the Union, in all its strength, for the security and protection of the commerce and soil of the United States.

The commerce is long since fallen a miserable sacrifice to the experiments of the Government; an enemy has been provoked to attack our soil. In the name of common justice permit me to ask, what right can you have to demand money of the States from which you withhold your promised protection? The moment, sir, that the contracted reciprocity is broken then you have violated the bond of union, and you deprive yourself of the right to ask for men or money. Indeed, sir, you absolve the States from their obligation to furnish you with either.

I deny, sir, that the compact on the part of Government has been fulfilled—it has ceased to do its duty—and there is too much reason to doubt the fidelity to place any confidence in the Government. Therefore, sir, if you divest the States of the means of defending themselves, by draughting away their men and taking away their money, you not only infringe the instrument, by virtue of which you claim the power, but you do an act of injustice—you grieve and oppress. Go on with the proposed plans of invasion, taxes, and perhaps conscriptions, and what will be the consequence? You will beggar the people, provoke the enemy of your own creating to invade the States, and then, after you have deprived them of the means of security, they will be left naked and ruined, to fall a prey to the power of an enemy enraged by your unsuccessful invasions.

It is said the Union is in danger, "and, unless we furnish the Government with prompt and effectual means, it will be too late." Sir, the Union, to all beneficial purposes, is already gone. Nothing but a name and shadow is left; a shadow intangible, empty, and evanescent. Inquire, sir, for it is worth your inquiry, what are the benefits contemplated by your Constitution that remain to the people? Can you vouch that there is one? It has been shown, that commerce and protection do not exist in any measure in the General Government. Its credit is gone, its strength is worn out, and pardon me when I say that the word Union cannot be applied to a people among whom nothing but a political bond exists, and that so worn and weakened that it binds to no beneficial purpose.

It has been also said, over the way, that "union is necessary to carry on the war, and give credit to the Government." It is much to be lamented that this consideration (which is by no means new) had not prevailed before the war was declared. Gentlemen will not deny that the warning voice of the minority told them the danger of declaring war against the feelings and wishes,

The Ways and Means.

if not of a majority, at least of a powerful minority of the people. Yes, sir, they were warned with a voice, solemn, argumentative, and prophetic, and the destructive result has proved with what accuracy the condemned expostulation of the minority were scorned. It is said that gentlemen are too late in calling for help. The Union is convulsed with those awful spasms that are the too certain precursors of dissolution.

An honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) observed, that we must have fifty thousand men raised for the next campaign, to invade the Canadas. How, sir, can they be raised? The most extravagant bounties for soldiers have been offered, and to little purpose; few have been enlisted, and it is thought still fewer will enlist on a further attempt; and, could you raise a large army, Canada is strongly defended, and defies your power.

The flower of the American army have made an attempt; they have fought well; have richly earned thanks and praise for themselves, and medals for their Generals; they have conquered, and how far have they progressed into the enemy's country? Merely obtained a foothold; and, in so doing, the army is almost annihilated. A few more victories like those would leave us destitute of a soldier—would leave us glory and ruin.

The same gentleman also observed, that "the aspect of the war was changed, and had now become defensive." In fact, sir, this is correct. Our enemy have become more powerful by their victories, and the consequent peace in Europe. The face of our affairs has changed in another respect. When the war was declared we were to take the Canadas in six weeks, and, after three campaigns, we have much less of their country than they have of ours. The change of the aspect of the war, it seems, ought to admonish us to beware. If, when the enemy had Europe to fight, we were unable to invade them with success, from whence do we derive a hope that we can now succeed, when we are their only enemy? I beseech gentlemen to deceive themselves no longer, but to abandon those airy schemes which can never be realized; which serve only to sink and ruin their country.

I would ask the honorable gentleman how, if he had money, he will obtain men for the invasion? Surely he cannot be ignorant that men will not enlist for that purpose; and I beg of the majority to reflect well before they attempt to force men into the ranks. The free and brave men of the North and East will never submit to the attempt. They will resist to blood those who shall encroach upon their liberties, and lamented consequences might follow such an attempt. The aspect of the war in such a case would change and become purely defensive, but it would wear frowns more terrible to the invaders than America has ever witnessed.

When Mr. S. had concluded—

A division of the question having been called on the resolution respecting the direct tax, the first question put was on the following part: "Resolved, that it is expedient to continue the direct tax." On this question, the votes were—For the motion 104, against it 26, as follows:

The question was then taken on the remaining clause of the resolution, "and to increase the same 100 per cent."—and decided as follows:

So it was determined to continue the present direct tax, and increase the same 100 per cent.

The second resolution, "to increase the duty on spirits distilled by an additional duty of twelve and a half cents per gallon," being under consideration, together with the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, going to increase the same to 15 cents per gallon—

Mr. FISK, of New York, renewed his motion to insert twenty-five instead of fifteen.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, in the course of discussion, moved to lay on the table so much of the report of the Committee of the Whole as applies to the resolution; which motion was agreed to; and then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, October 26.

Mr. INGERSOLL presented a petition of Stephen Girard, banker, of Philadelphia, setting forth that the provisions of the act laying duties on the notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies, which allows a composition, have been denied to him in his banking establishment, and praying that the provisions of said act may be extended to him.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, stating that no official books or papers were lost, belonging to that Department, in consequence of the late incursion of the enemy.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the question on the motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, to strike out fifteen (the proposed increase of the tax) and insert twenty-five cents per gallon, in addition to the present duty on the capacity of the still.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, spoke in favor of an early decision of the question, on this and other parts of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, spoke in opposition to Mr. FISK's motion, at some length, for reasons of a practical nature.

The question on Mr. FISK's motion was then determined in the negative—yeas 67, nays 74, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Butler, Chappell, Cilley, Comstock, Conduct, Cooper, Davenport, Denoyelles, Ely, Evans, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Gaston, Grosvenor, Hale, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, Moffit, Moseley, Nelson, Pickering, Pitkin Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Sage, Schureman, Seybert, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith of New York, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Brigham, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Clark, Clopton, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Farrow, Forney, Franklin, Geddes, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Law, Lefferts, Lewis, Lyle, Macon, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Sevier, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Tannehill, Thompson, Udree, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancy.

This motion having been negatived—Mr. FISK moved to amend the amendment of the Committee of the Whole by inserting twenty, instead of fifteen cents per gallon.

The question on this motion was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Avery, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Butler, Chappell, Cilley, Comstock, Conduct, Conard, Cooper, Crouch, Dana, Davenport, Denoyelles, Ely, Evans, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Gaston, Gholson, Grosvenor, Hale, Hawes, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, Moffit, Moore, Moseley, Nelson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Sage, Seybert, Sherwood, Skinner, Smith of New York, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wright—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Barbour, Bard, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Clark, Clopton, Crawford, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Farrow, Forney, Franklin, Geddes, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingham, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Law, Lewis, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Newton, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Sevier, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Thompson, Udree, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey—69.

So this amendment was carried.

And the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as last amended, was decided as follows: Affirmative votes 70, negative 60.

So the amendment as amended (that is, to insert twenty instead of twelve and a half cents per gallon, as the additional tax) was agreed to.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, then moved an amendment going to place a duty of — cents on every gallon of spirits from domestic materials, instead of dividing it between the capacity and product of the still.

Mr. Y. spoke in support of his amendment, which he conceived necessary to do equal justice to all distillers. &c.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, spoke in support of the motion. He acknowledged the necessity of providing a revenue, and there was no better subject of taxation than spirits, provided it was not taxed higher than it could bear.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, also spoke in favor of Mr. YANCEY's motion.

OCTOBER, 1814.

War Measures.

H. OF R.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, proposed to fill the blank in Mr. YANCEY's motion with twenty-five, and Mr. FISK, of New York, to fill it with thirty. But no motion was at present made on that head.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, opposed Mr. YANCEY's motion.

The question on Mr. YANCEY's motion was decided in the negative: For the amendment 55, against it 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Cannon, Clark, Clopton, Crawford, Culpeper, Desha, Duvall, Farrow, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Hall, Harris, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Humphreys, Hungerford, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lewis, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Newton, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickens, Rhea of Tennessee, Sevier, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stuart, Telfair, and Yancey.

Mr. CANNON, of Tennessee, then moved to strike out the additional duty of twenty cents per gallon, and in lieu thereof proposed an additional duty of one hundred per cent. on the present duty on stills. This motion was negatived without a division.

The question was then taken on the said second resolution, and carried in the affirmative by a large majority; when the direct-tax resolution adopted yesterday, and that just agreed to, were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means to report bills pursuant thereto.

And on motion the House adjourned until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, October 27.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. TAYLOR for consideration:

Resolved, That the standing committees of this House, and also the select committees appointed on the 21st day of September last, on the Message of the President of the United States, have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported the bill from the Senate "further extending the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the General Land Office," without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

13th CON. 3d Sess.—16

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the resolution from the Senate "expressive of the sense of Congress relative to the capture of the British sloop Reindeer, by the American sloop Wasp;" and the resolution was ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the modification proposed by the joint committee of conference, to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the resolutions "expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Major General Brown, Major General Scott, and Brigadiers Ripley, Miller, Porter, Gaines, and Macomb," and have modified the same accordingly.

WAR MEASURES.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Military Committee, reported a bill making further provision for filling the ranks of the Regular Army by classifying the free male population of the United States.

[This bill proposes to provide for the division of the whole free male population of the United States, by the assessors, into classes of twenty-five men each; each class to be compelled, under a penalty of — hundred dollars, to furnish, within — days after the classification aforesaid, an able-bodied recruit for the service of the United States. The bill is of some length, and contains very full provisions for carrying itself into effect.]

Mr. TROUP also reported a bill "to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to object."

Mr. TROUP also reported a bill "to provide for the further defence of the frontiers of the United States by authorizing the President to augment the present Military Establishment."

[This bill proposes to provide, that, "in addition to the present Military Establishment of the United States, there be immediately raised forty regiments, in such proportions of infantry, artillery, riflemen, and cavalry, as the President of the United States may deem proper, to be enlisted to serve during the war, unless sooner discharged, and limited as to service to the defence of the frontiers of the United States," &c.]

The three bills were severally twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TROUP also laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary at War to the Military Committee:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, October 17, 1814.

SIR: The great importance of the subject, and the other duties of the Department, which could not fail to be very sensibly felt, at so interesting a period, by a person who had just taken charge of it, are my apology for not answering your letter of the 24th of September at an earlier day, on the defects of the present Military Establishment.

Due consideration has been bestowed on the subject-matter of that letter, and I have now the honor to submit to the committee the following report:

1. That the present Military Establishment, amounting to sixty-two thousand four hundred and forty-eight men, be preserved and made complete, and that the most efficient means authorized by the Constitution and consistent with the general rights of our fellow citizens be adopted, to fill the ranks, and with the least possible delay.

2. That a permanent force, consisting of at least forty thousand men, in addition to the present Military Establishment, be raised for the defence of our cities and frontiers, under an engagement by the Executive with such corps that it shall be employed in that service within certain specified limits, and that a proportional augmentation of general officers of each grade, and other staff, be provided for.

3. That the corps of engineers be enlarged.

4. That the ordnance department be amended.

Respecting the enlargement of the corps of engineers, I shall submit hereafter a more detailed communication.

For the proposed amendment of the Ordnance department, I submit a report from the senior officer of that department in this city, which is approved.

I shall be ready and happy to communicate such further remarks and details on these subjects as the committee may desire, and shall request permission to suggest hereafter the result of further attention to, and reflection on, our Military Establishment generally, should anything occur which may be deemed worthy its attention. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Hon. G. M. TROUP,

Chairman Military Committee.

Explanatory Observations accompanying the Letter from the Secretary of War to the Chairman of the Military Committee of the House of Representatives.

In providing a force necessary to bring this war to a happy termination, the nature of the crisis in which we are involved, and the extent of its dangers, claim particular attention. If the means are not fully adequate to the end, discomfiture must inevitably ensue.

It may be fairly presumed, that it is the object of the British Government, by striking at the principal sources of our prosperity, to diminish the importance, if not to destroy the political existence of the United States. If any doubt remained on this subject, it has been completely removed by the despatches from our Ministers at Ghent, which were lately laid before Congress.

A nation contending for its existence against an enemy powerful by land and sea, favored in a peculiar manner by extraordinary events, must make great exertions, and suffer great sacrifices. Forced to contend again for our liberties and independence, we are called on for a display of all the patriotism which distinguished our fellow-citizens in the first great struggle. It may be fairly concluded, that if the United States sacrifice any right, or make any dishonorable concession to the demands of the British Government, the spirit of the nation will be broken, and the foundations of their union and independence shaken. The United States must relinquish no right, or perish in the struggle. There is no intermediate ground to rest on. A concession on one point, leads directly to the surrender of every other. The result of the contest cannot be doubtful. The highest confidence is entertained that the stronger the pressure, and the greater the danger, the more firm and vigorous will be the resistance, and the more successful and glorious the result.

It is the avowed purpose of the enemy to lay waste and destroy our cities and villages, and to desolate our coast, of which examples have already been afforded. It is evidently his intention to press the war along the whole extent of our seaboard, in the hope of exhausting equally the spirits of the people, and the national resources. There is also reason to presume, that it is the intention to press the war from Canada on the adjoining States, while attempts are made on the city of New York, and other important points, with a view to the vain project of dismemberment or subjugation. It may be inferred likewise to be a part of the scheme to continue to invade this part of the Union, while a separate force attacks the State of Louisiana, in the hope of taking possession of the city of New Orleans, and of the mouth of the Mississippi, that great inlet and key to the commerce of all that portion of the United States lying westward of the Alleghany mountains. The peace in Europe having given to the enemy a large disposable force, has essentially favored these objects.

The advantage which a great naval superiority gives to the enemy, by enabling him to move troops from one quarter to another, from Maine to the Mississippi, a coast of two thousand miles extent, is very considerable. Even a small force moved in this manner for the purposes avowed by the British commanders, cannot fail to be sensibly felt, more especially by those who are most exposed to it. It is obvious, if the militia are to be relied on principally for the defence of our cities and coasts against their predatory and desolating incursions, wherever they may be made, that, by interfering with their ordinary pursuits of industry, it must be attended with serious interruption and loss to them, and injury to the public, while it greatly increases the expense. It is an object, therefore, of the highest importance, to provide a regular force, with the means of transporting it from one quarter to another along our coast, thereby following the movements of the enemy with the greatest possible rapidity, and repelling the attack wherever it may be made. These remarks are equally true as to the militia service generally under the present organization of the militia, and the short terms of service prescribed by law. It may be stated with confidence, that at least three times the force in militia has been employed at our principal cities along the coast, and on the frontier, in marching to and returning thence, that would have been necessary in regular troops; and that the expense attending it has been more than proportionably augmented, from the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of preserving the same degree of system in the militia as in the regular service.

But it will not be sufficient to repel these predatory and desolating incursions. To bring the war to an honorable termination, we must not be contented with defending ourselves. Different feelings must be touched, and apprehensions excited in the British Government. By pushing the war into Canada, we secure the friendship of the Indian tribes, and command their services, otherwise to be turned by the enemy against us; we relieve the coast from the desolation which is intended for it, and we keep in our hands a safe pledge for an honorable peace.

OCTOBER, 1814.

War Measures.

H. OF R.

It follows, from this view of the subject, that it will be necessary to bring into the field, next campaign, not less than one hundred thousand regular troops. Such a force, aided in extraordinary emergencies, by volunteers and militia, will place us above all inquietude as to the final result of this contest. It will fix, on a solid and imperishable foundation, our union and independence; on which the liberties and happiness of our fellow-citizens so essentially depend. It will secure to the United States an early and advantageous peace. It will arrest, in the further prosecution of the war, the desolation of our cities and our coast, by enabling us to retort on the enemy those calamities which our citizens have been already doomed to suffer; a resort which self-defence alone, and a sacred regard for the rights and honor of the nation, could induce the United States to adopt.

The return of the regular force now in service, laid before you, will show how many men will be necessary to fill the present corps; and the return of the numerical force of the present Military Establishment, will show how many are required to complete it to the number proposed. The next and most important inquiry is, how shall these men be raised? Under existing circumstances, it is evident that the most prompt and efficient mode that can be devised, consistent with the equal rights of every citizen, ought to be adopted. The following plans are respectfully submitted to the consideration of the committee. Being distinct in their nature, I will present each separately, with the considerations applicable to it.

First Plan.—Let the free male population of the United States, between eighteen and forty-five years, be formed into classes of one hundred men each, and let each class furnish — men for the war, within thirty days after the classification, and replace them in the event of casualty.

The classification to be formed with a view to the equal distribution of property among the several classes. If any class fails to provide the men required of it, within the time specified, they shall be raised by draught on the whole class; any person thus draughted being allowed to furnish a substitute.

The present bounty in land to be allowed to each recruit, and the present bounty in money, which is paid to each recruit by the United States, to be paid to each draught by all the inhabitants within the precinct of the class, within which the draught may be made, equally, according to the value of the property which they may respectively possess; and if such bounty be not paid within — days, the same to be levied on all the taxable property of the said inhabitants. And in like manner, the bounty, whatever it may be, which may be employed in raising a recruit, to avoid a draught, to be assessed on the taxable property of the whole precinct.

The recruits to be delivered over to the recruiting officer in each district, to be marched to such places of general rendezvous as may be designated by the Department of War.

That this plan will be efficient, cannot be doubted. It is evident that the men contemplated may soon be raised by it. Three modes occur by which it may be carried into effect. 1st. By placing the execution of it in the hands of the county courts throughout the United States. 2d. By relying on the militia officers in each county. 3d. By appointing particular persons in each county for that purpose. It is believed that either of these modes would be found adequate.

Nor does there appear to be any well-founded objection to the right in Congress to adopt this plan, or to its equality in its application to our fellow-citizens individually. Congress have a right, by the Constitution, to raise regular armies, and no restraint is imposed in the exercise of it, except in the provisions which are intended to guard generally against the abuse of power, with none of which does this plan interfere. It is proposed, that it shall operate on all alike, that none shall be exempted from it except the Chief Magistrate of the United States, and the Governors of the several States.

It would be absurd to suppose that Congress could not carry this power into effect, otherwise than by accepting the voluntary service of individuals. It might happen that an army could not be raised in that mode, whence the power would have been granted in vain. The safety of the State might depend on such an army. Long continued invasions, conducted by regular, well-disciplined troops, can best be repelled by troops kept constantly in the field, and equally well disciplined. Courage in an army is in a great measure mechanical. A small body, well trained, accustomed to action, gallantly led on, often breaks three or four times the number of more respectable and more brave, but raw and undisciplined troops. The sense of danger is diminished by frequent exposure to it without harm; and confidence, even in the timid, is inspired by a knowledge that reliance may be placed on others, which can grow up only by service together. The grant to Congress to raise armies was made with a knowledge of all these circumstances, and with the intention that it should take effect. The framers of the Constitution, and the States who ratified it, knew the advantage which an enemy might have over us, by regular forces, and intended to place their country on an equal footing.

The idea that the United States cannot raise a regular army in any other mode than by accepting the voluntary service of individuals, is believed to be repugnant to the uniform construction of all grants of power, and equally so to the first principles and leading objects of the Federal compact. An unqualified grant of power gives the means necessary to carry it into effect. This is an universal maxim, which admits of no exception. Equally true is it, that the conservation of the State is a duty paramount to all others. The Commonwealth has a right to the service of all its citizens, or rather, the citizens composing the Commonwealth have a right collectively and individually to the service of each other, to repel any danger which may be menaced. The manner in which the service is to be apportioned among the citizens, and rendered by them, are objects of legislation. All that is to be dreaded in such a case, is the abuse of power, and happily our Constitution has provided ample security against that evil.

In support of this right in Congress, the militia service affords a conclusive proof and striking example. The organization of the militia is an act of public authority, not a voluntary association. The service required must be performed by all, under penalties which delinquents pay. The generous and patriotic perform them cheerfully. In the alacrity with which the call of the Government has been obeyed, and the cheerfulness with which the service has been performed throughout the United States by the great body of the militia, there is abundant cause to rejoice in the strength of our Republican institutions, and in the virtue of the people.

The plan proposed is not more compulsive than the militia service, while it is free from most of the objections to it. The militia service calls from home, for long terms, whole districts of the country. None can elude the call. Few can avoid the service, and those who do, are compelled to pay great sums for substitutes. This plan fixes on no one personally, and opens to all who choose it a chance of declining the service. It is a principal object of this plan to engage in the defence of the State the unmarried and youthful, who can best defend it and best be spared, and to secure to those who render this important service, an adequate compensation from the voluntary contribution of the more wealthy in every class. Great confidence is entertained that such contribution will be made in time to avoid a draught. Indeed it is believed to be the necessary and inevitable tendency of this plan to produce that effect.

The limited power which the United States have in organizing the militia may be urged as an argument against their right to raise regular troops in the mode proposed. If any argument could be drawn from that circumstance, I should suppose that it would be in favor of an opposite conclusion. The power of the United States over the militia has been limited, and that for raising regular armies granted without limitation. There was, doubtless, some object in this arrangement. The fair inference seems to be, that it was made on great consideration; that the limitation in the first instance was intentional, the consequence of the unqualified grant of the second.

But it is said, that by drawing from the militia service into the regular army, and putting them under regular officers, you violate a principle of the Constitution which provides that the militia shall be commanded by their own officers. If this was the fact the conclusion would follow. But it is not the fact. The men are not drawn from the militia, but from the population of the country; when they enlist voluntarily, it is not as militiamen that they act, but as citizens. If they are draughted it must be in the same sense. In both instances they are enrolled in the Militia corps, but that, as is presumed, cannot prevent the voluntary act in the one instance, or the compulsive in the other. The whole population of the United States within certain ages belong to these corps. If the United States could not form regular armies from them they could raise none.

In proposing a draught as one of the modes of raising men in case of actual necessity in the present great emergency of the country, I have thought it my duty to examine such objections to it as occurred, particularly those of a Constitutional nature. It is from my sacred regard for the principles of our Constitution that I have ventured to trouble the Committee with any remarks on this part of the subject.

Should it appear that this mode of raising recruits was justly objectionable on account of the tax on property, from difficulties which may be apprehended in the execution, or from other causes, it may be advisable to decline the tax, and for the Government to pay the whole bounty.

In this case it is proposed that, in lieu of the present bounty, the sum of fifty dollars be allowed to each recruit or draught at the time of his engagement, and one hundred acres of land in addition to the present bounty in land, for every year that the war may continue.

It is impossible to state with mathematical accuracy the number which will be raised by the ratio of four to one hundred, or one to twenty-five, nor is it necessary. It is probable that it will be rather more than sufficient to fill the present corps. The extra number, in that case, may form a part of the local force in contemplation, a power to that effect being given to the President.

No radical change in the present Military Establishment is proposed. Should any modification be found necessary, on further consideration, it will form the subject of a separate communication. It is thought advisable, in general, to preserve the corps in their present form, and to fill them with new recruits in the manner stated. All these corps have already seen service, and many of them acquired in active scenes much experience and useful knowledge. By preserving them in their present form, and under their present officers, and filling them with new recruits, the improvement of the latter will be rapid. In two or three months it will be difficult to distinguish between the new and old levies.

The additional force to be provided amounts to forty thousand men. Of this it is proposed that local corps be raised, to consist partly of infantry, partly of mounted men, and partly of artillery. There is reason to believe that such corps may be raised in the principal cities, and even on the frontier, to serve for the war, under an engagement as to the limit beyond which they should not be carried. Every able-bodied citizen is willing and ready to fight for his home, his family, and his country when invaded. Of this we have seen, in the present year, the most honorable and gratifying proofs. It does not suit all, however, to go great distances from home. This generous and patriotic spirit may be taken advantage of, under proper arrangements, with the happiest effect to the country, and without essential inconvenience to the parties.

The officers who may be appointed to command these corps should be charged with recruiting them. Local defence being their sole object, it may be presumed that the corps will soon be raised. Patriotism alone will furnish a very powerful motive. It seems reasonable, however, that some recompense should be made to those who relieve others from the burden. One hundred acres of land and fifty dollars to each recruit will, it is presumed, be deemed sufficient.

It is proposed that this additional force shall form a part of any plan that may be adopted.

Second Plan.—This plan consists of a classification of the militia, and the extension of their terms of service.

Let the whole militia of the United States be divided into the following classes, viz:

All free male persons capable of service, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, into one class; all those between the ages of twenty-five and thirty-two into another class; and those between thirty-two and forty-five into a third class.

It is proposed, also, that the President shall have power to call into the service any portion of either of these classes, which, in his judgment, the exigencies of the country may require, to remain in service two years from the time each corps shall be assembled at the appointed place of rendezvous.

It is believed that a shorter term than two years would not give to these corps the efficiency in military operations that is desired, and deemed indispensable, nor avoid the evils that are so sensibly felt, and generally complained of, under the present arrangement.

OCTOBER, 1814.

War Measures.

H. OF R.

It requires two campaigns to make a complete soldier, especially where the corps, officers and men, are alike raw and inexperienced. In the interim, the numbers must be multiplied to supply the defect of discipline. And it requires the extension of the term of service, to avoid the additional proportional augmentation of having so many in the field at the same time, in marching to the frontier and returning from it. The inconvenience to the parties, and loss to the community in other respects, need not be repeated. It is proper to add, only, that if substitutes are allowed in the service, it must put an end to the recruiting of men for the regular army, especially the old corps. Of the justice of this remark, what has occurred in the present year has furnished full proof. It follows that, if this plan is adopted, the militia must be relied on principally, if not altogether, in the further prosecution of the war.

The additional force for local service, amounting to forty thousand men, will likewise form a part, as already observed, of this plan.

Third Plan.—It is proposed to exempt every five men from militia service, who shall find one to serve for the war. It is probable that some recruits might be raised in this mode, in most or all the States. But it is apprehended that it would prevent recruiting in every other mode, by the high bounty which some of the wealthy might give. The consequence would probably be very injurious, as it is not believed that any great number could be raised in this mode.

Fourth Plan.—Should all the preceding plans be found objectionable, it remains that the present system of recruiting be adhered to, with an augmentation of the bounty in land. Should this be preferred, it is advised that, in addition to the one hundred and sixty acres of land now given, one hundred be allowed annually for every year while the war lasts.

These plans are thought more deserving the attention of the committee than any that have occurred. The first, for the reasons stated, is preferred. It is believed that it will be found more efficient against the enemy, less expensive to the public, and less burdensome on our fellow-citizens.

It has likewise the venerable sanction of our Revolution. In that great struggle, resort was had to this expedient for filling the ranks of our regular Army, and with decisive effect.

It is not intended by these remarks, should the first plan be adopted, to dispense altogether with the service of the militia. Although the principal burden of the war may thereby be taken from the militia, reliance must still be placed on them for important aids, especially in cases of sudden invasion. For this purpose, it will still be advisable that the men be classed according to age, and that their term of service be prolonged. Even should this plan be attended with all the advantages expected of it, such an arrangement could not fail to produce the happiest effect. The proof which it would afford of the impregnable strength of the country, of the patient virtue and invincible spirit of the people, would admonish the enemy how vain and fruitless his invasions must be, and might dispose him to a speedy, just, and honorable peace. Of the very important services already rendered by the militia, even under the present organization, too much cannot be said.

If the United States make the exertion which is proposed, it is probable that the contest will soon be at an end. It cannot be doubted that it is in their power to expel the British forces from this continent, should the British Government, by persevering in its unjust demands, make that an object with the American people. Against our united and vigorous efforts, the resistance of the enemy will soon become light and feeble. Success in every fair and honorable claim, is within our easy grasp. And surely the United States have every possible inducement to make the effort necessary to secure it. I should insult the understanding and wound the feelings of the committee, if I touched on the calamities incident to defeat. Dangers which are remote, and can never be realized, excite no alarm with a gallant and generous people. But the advantages of success have a fair claim to their deliberate consideration. The effort we have already made has attracted the attention and extorted the praise of other nations. Already have most of the absurd theories and idle speculations on our system of government been refuted and put down. We are now felt and respected as a Power; and it is the dread which the enemy entertain of our resources and growing importance, that has induced him to push the war against us, after its professed objects had ceased. Success, by discomfiture of his schemes, and the attainment of an honorable peace, will place the United States on higher ground, in the opinion of the world, than they have held at any former period. In future wars, their commerce will be permitted to take its lawful range unmoled. Their remonstrances to foreign Governments will not again be put aside unheeded. Few will be presented, because there will seldom be occasion for them. Our Union, founded on interest and affection, will have acquired new strength by the proof it will have afforded of the important advantages attending it. Respected abroad and happy at home, the United States will have accomplished the great objects for which they have so long contended. As a nation, they will have little to dread; as a people, little to desire.

Extract from Marshall's Life of Washington, volume 4th, page 241.

"In general, the Assemblies (of the States) followed the example of Congress, and apportioned, on the several counties within the State, the quota to be furnished by each. This division of the State was again to be subdivided into classes, and each class was to furnish a man by contributions or taxes imposed on itself. In some instances, a draught was to be used in the last resort; in others, the man was to be recruited by persons appointed for that purpose, and the class to be taxed with the sum given for his bounty."

Extract from Ramsay's Life of Washington, volume 2d, page 246.

"When voluntary enlistments fell short of the proposed number, the deficiencies were, by the laws of several States, to be made up by draughts or lots from the militia. The towns in New England, and the counties in the Middle States, were respectively called on for a specified number of men. Such was the zeal of the people of New England, that neighbors would often club together to engage one of their number to go into the Army. Maryland directed her lieutenants of counties to class all the property in their respective counties into as many equal classes as there were men wanted; and each class was by law obliged, within ten days thereafter, to furnish an able-bodied recruit during the war; and, in case of their neglecting or refusing to do so, the county lieutenants were authorized to procure men at their expense, at any rate not exceeding fifteen pounds in every hundred pounds worth of property classed agreeably to law. Virginia likewise classed her citizens, and called upon the respective classes for every fifteenth man for public service. Pennsylvania concentrated the requisite power in the President, Mr. Reed, and authorized him to draw forth the resources of the State, under certain limitations, and if necessary to declare martial law over the State. The execution of these arrangements, although uncommonly vigorous, lagged far behind."

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The resolution for imposing an additional duty on postage being under consideration, together with the amendment going to increase the rates of postage one hundred instead fifty of per cent. of their present amount, after considerable debate, the question on inserting "one hundred" instead of "fifty per cent." was decided in the affirmative: For one hundred 95, against it 45, as follows:

The question to adopt the resolution (as amended) to increase the present rates of postage, was then stated.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, assigned, as the principal reason why he should vote against this tax, that this was not a subject, the revenue on which could be safely or properly pledged to the public creditor. The revenue therefrom accruing, in fact, he conceived to be exclusively pledged to the perfection of the Post Office Establishment.

The question was then taken on the resolution as amended, and carried: For the postage-tax 96, against it 47, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Bur-

The next question for consideration presented itself in the following words: "Resolved, That it is expedient to add one hundred per cent. to the present duty on sales at auction;" and was agreed to without debate.

The next resolution was that embracing a tax, among other articles, on cotton yarn, and other manufactures, furniture, &c.

The questions to concur with the Committee of the Whole in striking out "cotton, yarn, and shoes." (that is, exempting them from taxation,) were decided in the affirmative without debate; as also was the proposition for taxing all manufactured paper at the rate of five per cent.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole to this resolution, having been gone through—

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, moved to strike out "tallow candles;" to which motion, Mr. J. REED proposed to add "spermaceti" candles. But, that motion not being in order, as an amendment to Mr. OAKLEY's motion, the question was taken by yeas and nays on striking out "tallow candles," and decided in the negative. For exempting "tallow candles" 59, against it 74, as follows:

Mr. J. REED then moved to strike out "spermaceti" candles, on account of the peculiarly oppressive operation of such a tax on the island of Nantucket and town of New Bedford, in Massachusetts. After further debate, the question was put, and decided in the negative by yeas and nays. For striking out "spermaceti" 50, against it 73, as follows:

Mr. BIGELOW, of Massachusetts, then moved to strike out the word "leather," so as to exempt it from taxation; which motion, Mr. B. supported at some length. The motion was negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. WHEATON, of Massachusetts, then moved to strike out the article "nails, manufactured by machinery." In support of which motion, he made some remarks, to which Mr. EPPES replied. And the motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, then moved to strike out so much of the resolution now under consideration as proposes to tax "furniture" above a certain value, (beds, bedding, kitchen furniture, and articles of domestic manufacture, excepted;) which motion was, without debate, decided in the negative. For the motion 43, against it 72, as follows:

The question was then stated on the whole resolution, (which goes to tax sundry articles of manufacture, besides those mentioned in the foregoing.)

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, stated that he was friendly to some and opposed to others of the taxes embraced in this resolve, and should therefore vote against the whole, reserving the right to vote for the bills for laying some of these taxes, when they should be brought in.

The question on the adoption of the whole of the resolution (as amended by striking out "cotton yarn" and "hats") was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 34, as follows:

The eighth, and last resolution. "That it is expedient to establish a National Bank, with branches in the several States," being under consideration—

On motion, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, October 28.

Mr. TROUP, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Major General Brown, Major General Scott, and Brigadiers Ripley, Miller, Porter, Gaines, and Macomb, made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the modification of the said amendments, as proposed by the committee of conference.

The bill from the Senate to give a further time for locating Virginia military land warrants was read a third time, and passed.

The resolution from the Senate expressive of the sense of Congress relative to the victory of the Wasp over the Reindeer, was read a third time, and passed unanimously.

Mr. DANA, of Massachusetts, laid before the House the petition of John Appleton, who being appointed Principal Assessor of the Tenth District of Massachusetts, performed all the duties of said office, when his nomination was rejected by the Senate, in consequence of which refusal to confirm his appointment, he loses the compensation due him; and praying that it may be directed to be paid to him.—Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the information requested by the House in relation to the retaliation prisoners; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIAM REED, of Massachusetts, after remarking, that he had understood there was before the Senate a bill for the increase of the naval force of the United States, in order to acquire information necessary to enable the House to act understandingly on the subject, submitted a resolve for consideration, which, after undergoing some modification, presented itself in the following shape:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House, a statement of the number of armed vessels belonging to the United States, at the declaration of the existing war, designating the names and force of each, and their present condition; also, the number and rate of new vessels, authorized and directed by law, since that time; the progress made in execution of these laws, and, if not completed, the causes that have prevented their execution.

After some desultory conversation, as to the state of the information on this subject, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the remaining part of the report of the Committee of the Whole—it being a resolution "that it is expedient to establish a National Bank with branches in the several States."

Mr. POST, of New York, hoped the chairman, or some member of the Committee of Ways and Means, would explain the reasons on which the proposition was founded.

Mr. CLOPTON, of Virginia, called upon gentlemen in favor of the proposition to show in what part of the Constitution was contained the power to establish a National Bank. Having always himself denied the Constitutional power, and the House having so decided six years ago, he could not see what had occurred to change the nature of the Constitutional question. Unless his objections on this head were removed, he must certainly vote against this proposition.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, said his sentiments in relation to this question were well known, and were not changed. However necessary he might believe the agency of such an institution at the present moment, he could not give his consent to a measure which he believed contrary to the Constitution. For the reasons in favor of the resolve which he had reported in obedience to the instructions of the committee, he referred to Mr. Dallas's report; and to the gentlemen of the committee who favored it.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, expressed himself decidedly in favor of the establishment of a bank, but, in order to obviate objections, some might conscientiously entertain on Constitutional grounds, he was of opinion that the bank ought to be located within this District. He therefore moved to amend the resolve by inserting therein the words "within the District of Columbia."

Mr. BURWELL, of Virginia, said he had no doubt of the power of Congress to establish a bank of the kind proposed, in the District of Columbia; but he should vote against the amendment, because he believed such a bank would not at all assist the finances of the Government. He was also entirely hostile to the establishment of a bank on the principles recommended in the Secretary's report as its basis, for reasons growing out of their general impracticability and inexpediency.

Mr. DUVALL, of Kentucky, said he was opposed to the proposed amendment, because it would destroy the utility of the bank, so far as regards its issuing a medium which should possess the general confidence, and he was opposed to it also because the adoption of it would virtually sanction the construction, which he denied, that it was not Constitutional to establish a bank with branches in the several States. Mr. D. was proceeding to argue in support of the Constitutionality of a bank—when

Mr. WRIGHT withdrew the amendment which he had proposed.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, moved to strike out of the resolve the following words: "with branches in the several States." Some gentlemen, he said, were of opinion a bank might be established adequate to all necessary purposes, having no branches, but arrangements with some one or more banks now existing in each State. He was in favor of leaving the question as broad as possible.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

Mr. DUVALL resumed his argument on the Constitutional question, which he examined with no little ability and ingenuity. He chiefly rested his opinion of the power to incorporate a bank on that section of the Constitution which prohibits the States to coin money, or issue "bills of credit;" which negation of power, he apprehended, implied the existence of the power in Congress. If Congress had not power under the Constitution of the United States to establish a bank or banks, nearly or all the States had violated their own State constitutions as well as the Constitution of the United States, in authorizing the circulation of bank notes, which, call them what you will, are "bills of credit." Mr. D. went deeper still into this question, and concluded with expressing his decided hostility to the proposed amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, having no doubt of the constitutionality of a National Bank, entreated gentlemen to vote down the proposed amendment; because, if adopted, it would hold out fallacious ideas of the adequacy of a bank without branches, to be established within this District, which would no more relieve the embarrassment of our finances, than will the five and ten cents bills issued by the Corporation of this City and Georgetown. He should vote for the general proposition. As for the Secretary's proposition, it was a felo de se; and many of its features could not be sanctioned in this House.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, said, that one of his earliest convictions on political topics, was, that this Government had no power to establish a National Bank; but, if it is to be established, he was clearly of opinion it ought to be on general principles. In order to give the question full and ample consideration on the widest national, just, and general objects, he should vote against the amendment, without intending in any way to sanction the idea that Congress has the power "to establish a National Bank with branches in the several States."

Mr. CLOPTON made a number of observations in reply to the argument of Mr. DUVALL. The true principle of construction of the Constitution being, that all powers not expressly delegated are reserved, he contended that Congress could by no forced construction, derive the power to establish a National Bank.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, predicated his views in favor of the resolution, and against the amendment, on the statement of facts and reasoning of the Secretary of the Treasury, on this subject, which combined, he believed to be conclusive.

Mr. MCKEE, of Kentucky, expressed surprise that the opposition to this measure, declared by the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary not only to the maintenance but to the restoration of the public credit, proceeded from those who had, in every other respect, been the most zealous and inflexible in their pursuit of measures to sustain the operations of the Government. He had no doubt of the power of the Government to establish a National Bank as an instrument of finance, and entered into a train of reasoning with his usual acumen, as well to prove this, as to prove the injury which had resulted from the refusal to recharter the late Bank of the United States. As to establishing the bank within this District, for all present practical purposes, it might as well be established in Abyssinia. He was decidedly opposed to the motion now under consideration.

The question on Mr. STANFORD's motion to strike out the words, "with branches in the several States," was decided by yeas and nays in the negative. For the motion 14, against it 138, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bard, Burwell, Clopton, Crawford, Gholson, Hall, Hungerford, Johnson of Virginia, Macon, Nelson, Newton, Pleasants, Smith of Virginia, and Stanford.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Ely, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Geddes, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Leferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Lyle, Markell, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moffit, Montgomery, Moore, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Ruggles, Sage, Schureman, Sovier, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Shepherd, Skinner, Smith of New York, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Troup, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wright, and Yancey.

The question being stated on the passage of the resolution—

Mr. POST, of New York, said, under present impressions, he should vote against it, because the idea it embraced was illusive, and its object impracticable at the present moment; to show which he made a number of remarks going to establish the insufficiency of such a measure to remedy the general want of confidence among individuals as well as in the banks, which at present prevailed.

The question on the adoption of the resolution was decided by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bradley, Brown, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Duvall, Earle, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Geddes, Gordin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hanson, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Lyle, Markell, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sherwood, Shipperd, Skinner, Smith of New York, Strong, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Udrec, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wright, and Yancey—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Burwell, Champion, Cilley, Clopton, Crawford, Davenport, Desha, Ely, Eppes, Evans, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Hale, Hall, Hawkins, Humphreys, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, King of Massachusetts, Law, Macon, Moseley, Nelson, Newton, Pitkin, Pleasants, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Taggart, Vose, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Wilson of Massachusetts—54.

So the resolution was agreed to, and this, together with the other resolutions, were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, to bring in bills accordingly.

SATURDAY, October 29.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, stating that the whole of the books, papers, trophies in his office, except the furniture, were preserved, and are now entire; and that all the books and papers in the Accountant's Office, except those papers relative to accounts settled and transmitted to the Treasury Department, have been preserved.

MR. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Moses Alley; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

That, at the declaration of war against Great Britain, and for some time previous thereto, the petitioner was an inhabitant of Upper Canada; in the Summer or Autumn of the year 1812, he came to the United States and reported himself to General Dearborn, who then commanded on the Northern frontier. Being considered of suspicious character, he was arrested by military authority, and sent to Greenbush, in New York, for examination; at the time of his arrest, he had in his possession a sorrel stud-horse, which was, by directions of the officer who arrested him, placed in the possession of a Mr. Benjamin Van Vleck for safe-keeping, at the expense of the United States, until he should receive further orders how to dispose of him. He kept the horse until the 16th of April, 1813, when, having had his house and property consumed by fire, he delivered the horse over for safe-keeping to a Mr. Norton, of Lewis county. He kept him until September, 1813, when he sold him, at the price of twenty dollars, to pay for his keeping. It does not appear to the committee who was the purchaser; but, from the manner in which the account for keeping the horse is credited, it is presumed that Norton himself was the purchaser. It appears, also, to the committee, from the certificate of Generals Wilkinson and Dearborn, that the charge against the petitioner was not well founded. He then received an order from General Wilkinson for his horse, to be delivered to him clear of the expense of keeping; but, upon application, found that he had been sold to pay that expense. The petitioner asks of Congress the value of the horse.

The committee are of opinion that the United States are under no legal obligation to pay for the horse; if the petitioner had a good title to the property, it is presumed he would be entitled to recover his value of the man in whose possession he was placed by the officer. Having been put in his possession upon conditions, and with instructions to keep him at public expense, it is believed he was not liable to be sold for that expense; they therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

MR. CLOPTON, of Virginia, introduced into the House, with a few appropriate observations, the following resolution:

"It being a duty particularly incumbent, in a time of public calamity and war, humbly and devoutly to acknowledge our dependence on Almighty God, and to implore his aid and protection: Therefore,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a joint committee of both Houses wait on the President of the United States, and request that he recommend a day of public humiliation, prayer, and fasting, to be observed by the people of the United States, with religious solemnity, and the offering of fervent supplications to Almighty God, for the safety of these States; his blessings on their arms, and a speedy restoration of peace."

The resolution was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The House resumed the consideration of a resolution offered a few days ago by MR. TAYLOR of New York, which was agreed to in the following words:

Resolved, That the Standing Committees of this House, and also the select committees appointed on the 21st day of September last, on the Message of the President United States, have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize a loan not exceeding — dollars.

MR. EPPES, of Virginia, moved to fill the blank for the amount to be borrowed, with three millions. The Secretary of the Treasury had recommended, in his letter, a larger sum to be borrowed; but since that letter had been written, it was ascertained that three of the six millions of stock proposed to be sent to Europe for sale had not yet left the country, and the President had determined to retain it. The retention of this stock from the market would, by so much as its amount, reduce the additional amount necessary to be authorized. It was therefore determined to ask only for three millions on this occasion.

The blank was filled accordingly.

OCTOBER, 1814.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided, also, That the making the loan authorized by this bill, the President shall in no case and in no way contract for a greater interest or premium than eight per cent. per annum."

Mr. GROSVENOR said, he had offered the amendment in the belief, nay, the certainty, that public credit and confidence would never be restored to any Government which supplied the treasury by loans, at the rate, and in the manner heretofore adopted by the President. To former bills similar amendments had been moved and rejected, and what had been the consequence? Let gentlemen cast their eyes upon the report of the Secretary of the Treasury at the commencement of the session. The Government had, under a bill just like the present, gone into the market for twenty-five millions. It first proposed for a part of that sum, to wit: ten millions. As it was well understood, by the influence of one man, a condition had been annexed to the ten millions then taken, of a most ruinous and extortionate character. That condition he need not state, because it was known to all; nor should he go over the calculations made the other day by his honorable friend from New York, (Mr. OAKLEY.) If that gentleman was correct, and not a doubt existed that he was so, this very condition had forced the Government to take another portion of the loan, about two millions and a half, at more than fifty per cent. for the present year of its existence, and at six or seven per cent. forever thereafter. How could this condition operate differently? It made it the interest of every holder of the first part of the twenty-five million loan (and it was certain that, as far as possible, every moneyed man in the nation would be made a holder) to bear down upon the Government, and for them to give the most exorbitant premium for all that remained to be taken. This was early foretold by the men of reflection among us. But it was treated as a chimaera, as the common story of opposition, by those whose business it is to defend every act of the Government. Now, the truth of what was foretold is absolutely certain. It stands on the official documents in this House, an eternal monument of the wild errors, and the fiscal incapacity of your Government. By it the people of these States have been subject to the most frightful extortion. Do I therefore accuse those who forced the Government to these terms? No; for to such a condition was the Government reduced in September, that even an open bankruptcy must have followed, but for the money then obtained. And if these money lenders had so pleased, you must have saved the nation by giving cent per cent for every dollar. Patriotism has nothing to do with this subject. It is a moneyed operation; and thus considered, perhaps you ought to thank the lenders that they accommodated you at all, rather than to curse them for the terms they demanded.

Mr. G. said, to a Government which had thus exhibited an utter disregard of the plainest rules of discretion and common sense—an entire ignorance of public policy—who had shown an incapacity for all fiscal operations, and had delivered themselves and their country, bound hand and foot, into the iron grasp of money lenders, he was totally unwilling, nay, he thought it madness, to trust unlimited powers as to further loans.

Sir, said Mr. G., you have rejected in Committee a proposition to render your taxes responsible for your loans, by pledging them specifically to the payment of the interest, and the gradual redemption of the principal. You are adopting the same old principles, and pursuing the same old course, which has produced the evils of the past year. You are again pledging the faith of the nation, instead of the wealth of the nation, to obtain loans. The Secretary of the Treasury has told you, and wisely told you, that this has been the cause of your failures—the principle which has destroyed your credit and ruined your finances. And he has told you that your system must be changed, or all your efforts are hopeless. Why will you disregard his admonition—an admonition enforced by the most disastrous experience? By this bill your President again appears in the money market, precisely as he appeared on the 31st of last August; can he get money on better terms now than he could then? Nay, is not the prospect darker and more desperate? And may he not, nay, will he not, pressed on by the public creditors and the public necessities, be induced to give almost any premium rather than fail? Unless his power be limited, he will again deliver the people as unresisting victims to the brokers and money lenders of the nation. Sir, to this I, as one, never will consent. Wishing, as I do, to preserve the remnant of public credit; anxious as I am to give my vote to provide for the defence of the soil, I cannot vote for this bill in its present shape. I cannot vote for it, because I am certain that by it you will obtain no money, but on terms extortionate, ruinous, and which will give the last blow to the expiring credit of the nation.

Mr. EPPES said he had no idea that a larger interest than eight per cent. would or ought to be given for this money, and he did not feel any great objection to the amendment. But he could see no reason, when this bill was merely intended to supply the amount sent to Europe for sale of the loan last authorized, why it should be granted in a different form from that.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, said that gentlemen were mistaken in the calculation of the rate of interest given by the Government for the loans lately negotiated. They were obtained at seven and a half per cent. with a bonus, payable whenever the debt was extinguished, of twenty-five per cent. on the money loaned. This was demonstrable by a plain question in the rule of three. For example, the Government for eighty dollars issued a scrip for one hundred bearing six per cent. interest. If, therefore, eighty dollars gives six dollars of interest, one hundred dollars will give seven dollars and a half, or seven and a half per cent. As to the bonus, if it be divided on twelve and a half years it will make two per cent., if on twenty-five years one, and if a hundred, only one fourth per cent. The term of twelve years, specified in the contract, is a limitation of the right of the Government to redeem within that period; not an engagement to pay at the expiration of it. It was inserted at the instance and for the benefit of the stockholders, who being disposed to make an investiture in the funds, preferred a deferred payment to a speedy redemption, for the obvious reason that induces men of wealth to prefer a bank, or other moneyed institution, with an unlimited or extensive charter to any other, viz: that there will be no necessity for an early re-investiture, or a loss by the want of employment for their capital. No one will pretend to say that the Government is legally or morally bound to repay the capital advanced in twelve years, or in one hundred years, or a hundred centuries, provided it pays punctually the accruing interest. Such an obligation to pay in twelve years, would require the most oppressive system of taxation. It cannot be denied that the persons who loaned the last money to the Government made the most exorbitant exactions. The state of the country imperiously demanded money at any price; and they rose in proportion to the pressure. As we were not bound, he would not pay off the capital of that debt, until every other contracted upon better terms was extinguished, unless it was selling under par in the market, and they would, in that way, relinquish a portion of their spoils. This could be done by changing the mode of borrowing, and instead of a bonus, increase the rate of interest. Give, if necessary, eight per cent. as was done by a former Administration, for future loans, and it would be made the duty of Government to pay them off first, which was the practice in relation to the eight per cent. and six per cent. stock heretofore. It would be recollected (Mr. J. observed) that when the old debt was assumed, a large portion of it was deferred and three per cent. stock, and the Secretary of the Treasury had been authorized to pay off those three per cents. at sixty-eight dollars per centum. This was never complained of; the holders were under no compulsion to take less than cent per cent., and if they receive their interest for ever, the contract of the Government was fulfilled. So, if the present six per cents fall below par, there would be immorality in employing agents to purchase them at a discount. If the principal were due, such a measure would be a breach of faith, but until it becomes payable there was no impropriety in buying the stock at market price; and it could not be pretended that a change of the mode as proposed would be derogatory to the spirit of the existing contracts. Among all the objections urged against the eight per cent. loans, no one ever suggested this; and hence it may be fairly asserted that it would be untenable. Whatever might be his opinion as to the conduct of the money lenders, Mr. J. declared he would faithfully perform the contract made with them by paying the interest on their loans quarter-yearly, even if it were necessary to quadruple the contemplated taxes; and he expressed some surprise at the pretended solicitude which his remarks produced in a certain quarter, when the sentiment had been avowed by one of the leaders of Opposition, and applauded by them, that the Federal party would not be bound to pay the interest on the debt incurred by the Government, although they entertained no doubt of soon supplanting the men in power. Mr. J. said these remarks were merely incidental to the argument concerning the rate of interest given. He was of opinion that those disadvantageous contracts were in a great degree owing to the spirit of opposition, whereby the capitalists of the country were prevented from entering into competition with the men who contracted for the late loans, and not to the want of confidence in the good faith and ability of the nation. As to the pledge in the mode proposed, Mr. J. said, he had insuperable objections. The taxes designated were novel in this country; some of them were very high, and others were denounced by the gentlemen as oppressive. He would not entail these upon the people, and deprive the nation of the advantages which experience might afford to substitute others for them, or if the revenue were ample dispense with them altogether. It was urged, said Mr. J., that the money lenders require a more solid security than the pledge of the national faith; they prefer specific pledges, and the case of a mortgage by an individual was mentioned as analogous. Mr. J. said, that the obvious dissimilarity consisted in this: Where an individual executed a mortgage, he transferred all control over his property to a third party, and in default of payment, the courts of justice interposed and delivered over his property to the mortgagee or a purchaser. Not so with the Government; there was no physical control vested in an independent tribunal to coerce a compliance—it had only to repeal the law to defeat the security, and there was no restraint upon this power but the moral sense of the Government, which it was said cannot be relied on. Mr. J. said it was not necessary that the faith of the Government should be pledged, in terms, by any law or contract. The passage of a law vesting a right, or conferring a power, was a pledge in fact that the right should be preserved and the power, when executed, be irrevocable and obligatory; but, inasmuch as that phraseology had been used he would not object to it. With these views Mr. J. said he could not imagine that a formal pledge of funds to meet the engagements of the Government was in any case necessary; inasmuch as the good faith of the nation was pledged to make good its engagements, and, having never been violated, it was not suspected by any. Yet, he added, as some gentlemen argued differently, and it might by possibility have an influence on the price of stock, he was willing to vote for an amendment whereby the taxes proposed should be pledged until an equivalent security was substituted for them.

The question on Mr. GROSVENOR'S amendment was decided affirmatively, as follows: For the amendment 59, against it 58.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, then moved a further amendment, viz: to strike out the general pledge of public faith to make good any deficiency in the funds for payment of the principal and interest of this loan, and insert in lieu thereof, a pledge of the proceeds of the direct tax and internal duties for that purpose: For the motion 41, against it 71.

The bill having been further immaterially amended, the Committee rose and reported the bill.

The House having confirmed the amount of three millions to be borrowed, the question offered itself on the concurrence with the Committee of the Whole, in agreeing to Mr. GROSVENOR's amendment; on which question the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. GROSVENOR.

On this motion there arose a long and desultory debate, in the course of which the motion was opposed by Messrs. LOWNDES, GHOLSON, CALHOUN, WRIGHT, and KILBOURN, and supported by the mover, and Messrs. HULBERT, GASTON, and HANSON.

On the one hand, it was argued, that such a limitation as was proposed was inexpedient because it was unusual; because it would have the effect rather to increase than limit the rate at which the loan could be had; and because, by a remote possibility, it might prevent the loans being had at all, and thus, as this loan was only necessary to meet the reimbursement of public debt during this quarter, produce consequences ruinous to the public credit. Occasion was taken to rebut the statements made by Mr. OAKLEY the other day in relation to the terms of the late loan, and to vindicate in the warmest terms the conduct of the Executive in this respect. Occasion was also taken to state several facts, among which were these: that the interest which this Administration had given for money was less than had been given by the Federal Administration under circumstances which afforded incomparably greater facility for loans; that notwithstanding all the clamors against the credit of the nation, it is now better supported, by a sinking fund, &c., than it was in the days when those were in power who now decry it; and that the refusal of a Boston bank lately to pay the interest of the public debt in specie, arose from no fault of the Government, which then had in the vaults of that bank three times the amount which was there due.

On the other hand, it was said, that the late improvidence of the Administration made it necessary to provide such a guard over their conduct. The consequence of what he called fiscal gambling, it was said by one speaker, (Mr. HANSON,) had been to throw the country into the arms of speculators; to make the Government the victim of such men as Jacob Barker, who, it appeared by the documents had been unable to fulfil his engagements, and he believed that failure was the foundation of this loan. To insure the co-operation of those who spoke thus, and the confidence of the country, it was said to be necessary to give some pledge that the Government would change its course, and no longer trust itself in the hands of extortioners, &c.

Mr. HANSON's remarks were as follows:

Mr. H. observed, he now felt the same reluctance in presenting himself to the Chair which he always felt, condemning, as he did, the example of daily and constantly, upon all subjects, consuming the time, and trespassing upon the patience of the House.

As so much had been said about union and patriotism, he saw fit distinctly to notice these topics, at the same time that he reprobated the course about to be adopted to relieve the Treasury, somewhat, in its embarrassments. Mr. H. trusted that on this, as on all other occasions, his nature would show itself to be utterly irreconcilable, and his principles openly at war, with the meanness and duplicity which would act a part to gain a name for magnanimity, and attract vulgar and insincere applause for patriotism. Patriotism! in the modern acceptance of the term, the very sound was hateful and grating to his ears. From the day of the first dawn of reason and philosophy in France, the loudest patriots in every country, visited by the revolutionary mania, had always been the boldest traitors. They were ever ready to sell, for their twenty pieces of silver, themselves or their country to the highest bidder. It was the brawling demagogues who drove the profitable trade of patriotism, and lived upon its avails, that had plunged the country into a wasteful, bloody, and calamitous war; who had brought upon the country the sufferings and burdens which bowed it down to the very dust it was biting, and jeopardized its very political existence. Such men were the curse of every country that contained them. It had been well said, by a moral essayist, that patriotism had become the last refuge of a scoundrel. From the accusation of such patriotism he meant at least to deliver himself.

[Mr. H. was called to order by a member, who erroneously took to himself, particularly, the general denunciation of the great body of patriots in the country.]

Mr. H. would admit no man in the nation to be before him in an ardent desire to provide the means for defending the country. The proper course being taken to effectuate the object which all professed to have at heart, he was as anxious and as ready as any gentleman to co-operate in the necessary measures to restore and support public credit, and resuscitate the finances. Unless public credit was revived, and the Treasury relieved, it was idle to talk of defending the country. Money was the great sinew of war. Without it the invader could not be repelled, the country could not be defended. It was mockery to talk of defending the country, without providing the means, but that defence and protection must be extended equally to all parts of the Union. Mr. H. was as ready as any gentleman to expose his person and spill his blood in defence of his country; could he, then, be disposed to withhold money for the same purpose? Life and treasure were not to be weighed against each other. He would vote for the loan, provided gentlemen would not continue to disregard and set at naught the established maxims of all well regulated Governments.

If they would not set experience at defiance, and treat with contempt its lessons so dearly bought, but would follow the counsels of wisdom, his hearty support was already pledged. But if they persisted in a downward course of desperate fiscal gambling, subjecting themselves to be preyed upon by harpies, speculators, and usurers, it was impossible, without an abandonment of the most sacred duties, to give any countenance to their measures. The inevitable consequence of such a course was bankruptcy and ruin, for already was the credit of the Government no better than that of Jacob Barker's himself, with which it had been identified. It appeared by the late Secretary's report, with the accompanying documents, that there was a defalcation on the part of some one of the contractors for the ten million loan to an immense amount, and there was no doubt that the said Barker was the defaulter referred to, although the Secretary had not mentioned his name.

Mr. H. said he was placed in a most painful situation. Understanding that the system of finance, which had brought so much distress and disgrace upon the country, was to be abandoned, and that gentlemen had been at last brought to consent to resort to the fundamental maxims of finance, which forbid the creation of debt without providing and pledging the means of payment, he had voted for the highest rate of taxes. He had done so under the fullest persuasion, he might say an assurance, that the taxes were to be specifically appropriated for the payment of the interest, and the ultimate reimbursement of the principal of the public debt. He had done so under the belief that the sponge was to be applied to the system of finance hitherto relied on; that we were all prepared to rub out and begin anew, having the benefit of experience to steer us clear of the shoals and rocks upon which the vessel of State had been so near bilging.

Mr. H. hoped that the limitation of interest moved by his friend from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) would be adopted. He had no doubt that the money could be had upon more advantageous terms if security was given, by pledging the public funds for the payment of the debt, but after the experience we had had of the profusion and profligacy introduced into the Treasury Department in the loan negotiations, there could be no reliance on the Administration to obtain loans upon better terms; they should, therefore, be restricted in the interest to be given. So extremely anxious was Mr. H. to place the country in the best possible posture of defence, in the hope that the nation might yet be saved, and to take from those who are responsible for its preservation and safety all pretexes for shifting the blame upon other shoulders, that he would still vote for the bill if the amendment failed, as it was pretty evident it would do. But although the rejection of that amendment did not present an insurmountable difficulty, should the House refuse to accept the amendment moved by his friend next to him, (Mr. OAKLEY,) in Committee, Mr. H. could not in his conscience vote for the bill. He could not bring himself to sanction a vicious, ruinous, system, which had been the cause of all our financial embarrassments and disgrace. Why, after the fatal experience we had had of the futility of all attempts to borrow money upon reasonable terms, without pledging something more substantial than the public faith for its repayment, and the punctual discharge of the interest, persist in the old plan of expedients, of living from hand to mouth, of squandering all to-day and letting to-morrow provide for itself. Why persist in a system which can eventuate in nothing but ruin? Was the mere pride of opinion to stand between the country and its defence—probably its salvation! He hazarded nothing in saying that the loan would fail, or be obtained upon the most ruinous terms, unless something more substantial than the moral sense of the nation was pledged as security. That moral sense was the reliance for the former loans, and it was now thirty per cent. below par; yes, the moral sense of the nation had depreciated 30 per cent. since the last session of Congress.

He, Mr. H., was the more surprised at the determination of gentlemen to go into the market to borrow three millions of dollars, without offering any new inducement, but, on the contrary, refusing to give security when they have 13 millions of the 25 million loan still on hand, and for which there had been no bid. His surprise was the more excited at the determination of gentlemen to adhere to the old plan of finance, when the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means avowed that the money to be borrowed was to pay the interest of the public debt which fell due the present quarter. If such was the important and indispensable uses to which it was to be applied, how could gentlemen reconcile it to good conscience and duty to hesitate to give the pledge and security which would insure success, when, by refusing it, everything was put at hazard. Anxious as Mr. H. was to demonstrate, in every way, his ardent desire to revive and sustain public credit, which was inseparably connected with the national defence, he could not, in any way, countenance the system which it seemed was to be persisted in, let the consequence be what it might. The great object to be accomplished, was to restore confidence in the ability and efficiency of the national finances, which was only to be done by an adequate provision for the wants of Government, and pledging the public funds for the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal of the public debt. Public credit was a sentiment; like matters of faith, it was a thing not to be reasoned about. If gentlemen expected to restore public confidence, and thereby recover public credit, they must abandon at once, and forever, their old shifts and expedients adopted with a single view to their popularity.

He again reminded the House that the system they seemed disposed to persevere in, could result in nothing but disappointment and disgrace to themselves, and injury to the country. Was everything to be sacrificed, even our political existence, to the pride of opinion? It would not be amiss to embrace the present occasion to remind gentlemen, that the minority had ever protested against the system of finance which had induced the embarrassments the Treasury labored under.

They clearly foresaw, and distinctly and repeatedly foretold, its fatal consequence. They opposed the war in all its approaches, in all its parts, and in every stage of it. They had constantly held up to view the enormous expenditures to which it would subject the country. They had pointed out the manner in which the general measures of Government would destroy the revenue and resources of the country. They knew, and declared, whenever an opportunity occurred, that loans after loans must be resorted to, and that loans could not be had except upon the most ruinous terms, unless general confidence was produced in the ability and efficiency of the national finances, and that the finances could not have a solid basis without an efficient and permanent system of taxation. The Congress was conjured not to declare war. The most conspicuous men of the majority admitted that war ought not to be declared, unless gentlemen were prepared to enact such a system. The fatal step being taken, its authors were admonished, warned, not to reply upon loans to defray the expenses of the war, without laying a broad and solid foundation for the finances. The inevitable fatal consequences of such a reliance, were predicted. From your pen, and from your lips, sir, (said Mr. H., pointing to the Speaker,) proceeded the same admonitions and predictions. We, differently situated from you, sir, enjoying as you do, the rare and singular felicity of uniting the confidence of a majority of all parties, we did not escape suspicion and censure. We were accused of predicting what we secretly labored to realize, the greatest national calamity, an explosion of public credit. It is to be lamented that your advice and our predictions were regarded as worthy only of scoff and crimination. We were both supported at the time by the concurrent opinions of all the enlightened men of the country, and the subsequent expositions and advice of two successive Heads of the Treasury Department corroborate and establish the soundness of our opinions. But party prejudice and the pride of opinion is not to be affected by argument. There is but one school, the teacher in which is Experience, where the intellects of some men can be illuminated.

Mr. H. incidentally noticed the reference of Mr. EPES to the difficulties which arose in relation to the payment of the interest of the public debt due in one section of the country. Mr. EPES laid the blame of the defalcation to a Boston bank. Mr. H. said, the circumstances in relation to the default of the bank alluded to, were too well established and known to admit of any misunderstanding or delusion. In conformity to the settled system of favoritism, the Gerry-mander State Bank had been selected by Government as most worthy of its confidence and patronage. If that bank, the circumstances attending the creation of which were so well known, was the only one in Boston unable to continue its payments in specie, there was no difficulty in properly attaching the blame of the failure to meet the public engagements.

Mr. H. reiterated the declaration of his readiness to co-operate in every practical and effectual effort to revive public credit. He had only to repeat his sincere regret that gentlemen in the majority had not brought their minds to adopt the only measure that could accomplish the all-important and desirable object. It was their refusal to come at once to the determination which they must at last come to, if public credit was ever to be recovered, that placed him in his present painful situation. After the pledge which he had given, by his vote for all the tax resolutions, he might appear inconsistent in voting against a loan which was declared to be indispensable for the public service, but it was impossible for him to sanction what he had always pronounced to be a system of desperate financial gambling. Suppose, said he, an individual reduced by extravagance, gaming and improvident speculations, to bankruptcy and ruin, were to call upon his family and friends to extricate him from his difficulties. Could they be expected to give him assistance unless he promised to forsake and renounce his ruinous courses, and no more pursue his pernicious practices? Could they be expected, without such a promise, and the more upon his positive refusal, to give such a promise—could they be expected to supply him with the means of continuing his dissolute and riotous course of life, and thus waste their own substance without affording any lasting relief to him? The mistaken zeal of friendship, and the blind excess of affection, sometimes betrayed individuals in private life into such acts of folly, and they have become partners in the ruin and sorrow of their friends and relatives. But public men, who had in charge the happiness and destiny of a people, must hush and subdue the feelings of weakness springing from the frail nature of man. Not generosity, but the fixed principles of right and justice they were bound to regard. When was it, said Mr. H., that the prodigal son was received again into the paternal mansion? It was when he had forsaken his evil ways, abandoned his riotous course of life, and returned to the paths of prudence and of duty.

If gentlemen were not sufficiently instructed in the school of experience, as to agree to abandon their political system generally, they had only to give up their vicious destructive system of finance, to insure a cordial concurrence in the necessary measures to build up the dilapidated credit of the nation upon a new and solid foundation. To do this, nothing more was required but to recur to the example, the principles and system of their predecessors in power. There were two roads leading to prosperity and adversity, one to the right the other to the left. We had travelled the wrong road for fourteen years, and had gone an immense distance, but the shortest way to get right was to go back to where we started. It was the only sure mode of arriving at the goal we all professed to aim for, the safety, honor, and prosperity of the nation.

The question on concurrence in the amendment was then decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 97, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Sherwood, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Stanford, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

NAYS—Messrs. So the amendment made in Committee of the Whole was rejected by the House.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, renewed the motion he had made in committee to pledge specifically the proceeds of the direct tax and internal duties for the redemption of the principal and interest of the loan.

On suggestion of Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, Mr. OAKLEY so modified his motion as to embrace also a pledge of the duties on impost and tonnage.

This motion was opposed by Mr. EPPES, and Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, and opposed by Messrs. HANSON, WRIGHT, FARROW, of South Carolina, and RICH, of Vermont.

Mr. RICH offered an amendment to the amendment of Mr. OAKLEY, the object of which was to extend the pledge to such part of the loan of twenty-five millions as remains uncontracted for.

Mr. OAKLEY objected to this amendment because it would have a retro-active operation, in consequence of the terms of the ten million loan, by which the contractors were to have the most advantageous terms which might be allowed to the lenders of the remainder of the twenty-five million loan.

The amendment moved by Mr. RICH was negatived.

The motion of Mr. OAKLEY was then further opposed by Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, and Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, and supported by Mr. GASTON, and the mover.

This motion was opposed on the ground that to adopt it would place this loan on a footing different from any other; that it was unnecessary, because the funds already established were abundantly sufficient to redeem the public debt, and because the Sinking Fund was about to be re-organized so as to be more active in its operation. In allusion to the argument of the mover of this motion, and his friends, on the question of the removal of the Seat of Government, it was said, rather jocosely than seriously, that it would be perfectly unimportant to establish such a pledge, because pledges by one Congress are not binding on another, being at any moment liable to be repealed.

The motion was warmly supported, on the ground that it was expedient to place the credit of the Government in future loans on such a broad, visible basis as should satisfy the most scrupulous lender of the security of his money; that it was the want of such a basis which had interposed a difficulty in the obtaining former loans; that the loans so obtained ought not to be placed on a par with future loans, obtained on terms more favorable to the Government; that the sponge ought to be applied to the old system of finance, and a new, better, and more durable system substituted for it, of which the provision proposed in this motion should constitute a feature.

Mr. OAKLEY's motion was negatived—for it 37, against it 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bigelow, Boyd, Caperton, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Duvall, Farrow, Gaston, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Ingham, Irving, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Lefferts, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, William Reed, Rich, Ruggles, Seybert, Sherwood, Skinner, Sturges, Thompson, Vose, White, and Wright.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Another member, to wit: from Connecticut BENJAMIN TALLMADGE, appeared, and took his seat.

OCTOBER, 1814.

Petition of Rebecca Hodgson.

H. OF R.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky,
Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims be directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing Captain Richard Taylor, senior, his claims for medical aid for his wounds received in the Revolution, commutation of half pay, and a pension from the United States, in addition to the one received from the State of Virginia.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for authorizing the Secretary of State, during the continuance of the present war, to give additional compensation to masters of vessels for bringing home destitute and distressed American seamen from abroad; which was read, and committed.

Mr. E. also reported a bill for the relief of John Castille; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. E. also made an unfavorable report on the petition of John H. Beasley and others; which was, on motion of Mr. FISK, of Vermont, recommended to the Committee of Ways and Means for further examination.

The joint resolution, offered by Mr. CLOPTON, of Virginia, for the appointment of a committee to wait on the President, and request him to appoint a day of public humility, fasting, and prayer, was also ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and to be read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on Public Lands were directed to inquire into the expediency of granting to Anthony Shane, (a half-breed Indian who has performed eminent services to the United States,) the right of the United States to three hundred and twenty acres of land in the State of Ohio, at a place on St. Mary's river, known by the name of Shane's Crossing; and leave was given to them to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The engrossed bill to authorize a loan for a sum not exceeding three millions of dollars, was read a third time, and passed without debate or division, though not without opposition.

The report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the petition of Joseph Forrest, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was concurred in by the House.

A bill was received from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described." [The bill provides for the building or purchase and employment of any number not exceeding twenty vessels, to carry not less than eight nor more than fourteen guns.]

The bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAM REED, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 28th instant, and the same being again read, a motion was made by Mr. WILLIAM REED, to amend his said motion, by striking out from the word "war," to the end thereof, and to insert the following words:

"Which have since that time been commissioned for service, designating the names and force, with the number of officers and men attached to each, and the present condition of these vessels; and if any essential change has been made in any of them during that time; also, the number of vessels that have been added to the force on the Atlantic, under authority of the laws of 2d of January and 3d of March, 1813; and if those laws have not been fully executed, the progress that has been made, and the causes that have prevented their entire execution."

The adoption of this resolution was opposed by Mr. PLEASANTS of Virginia, and RHEA of Tennessee, and supported by the mover; but finally rejected by the following vote: For the motion 52, against it 63.

PETITION OF REBECCA HODGSON.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Rebecca Hodgson; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The report is as follows:

That on the 14th day of August, 1800, Joseph Hodgson, then of the City of Washington, leased, by deed, for the term of eight months, to Samuel Dexter, as Secretary of War, a tenement in the said city, to be occupied for the term aforesaid, as the War Office. In consideration of which occupation and use, he was to give the sum of four hundred dollars, which has been paid and satisfied to the intestate of the petitioner. In the lease, Mr. Dexter covenants for himself and his successors in office, "that he or they shall and will, at all times during the said term, keep, or cause to be kept, in good and sufficient repair the said demised premises, inevitable casualties and ordinary decay excepted, and the same so well and sufficiently kept in repair, shall and will, at the end of the said term, yield and surrender up to him, the said Joseph Hodgson." Mr. Dexter immediately took possession of the tenement, under the contract, and occupied the same as the War Office, until the 8th of November, following, when, in the evening of that day, it was consumed by fire. The petitioner is the legal representative of Joseph Hodgson, and prays of Congress such compensation as the circumstances of her case merit.

In the investigation of the merits of this claim, the first question that presented itself to the committee was, in what manner was the fire communicated to the house? Was it by negligence or inattention to duty on the part of the officer or his servants, or was it from some other cause not within his or their control? It would seem, from the evidence of the petitioner, that she alleges the fire was communicated by design, with a criminal intention to destroy the house and the public papers contained in it, by some person employed by the War Department.

It is also alleged, that the fire was communicated from an adjoining building, belonging to, and then in possession of, a Mr. Jackson. It is not pretended by the petitioner that the house was burnt by any negligence or inattention on the part of the lessor, or his servants or clerks; indeed, the evidence is clear and satisfactory, that the room in which it is alleged by the petitioner the fire originated, had not been used, nor fire made in it, for several weeks previous to the destruction.

Your committee have diligently examined the circumstances offered in evidence, and are of opinion the fire was communicated from the fire-place of Jackson's house, and in this they concur in opinion with a committee appointed by the House of Representatives, in

H. OF R.

Suspension of Direct Tax, &c.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

February, 1801, to investigate the causes of the destruction of the War Office, and also with the committee to whom this petition was referred at the last session of Congress.

Assuming, then, as an established fact, that the fire was communicated from Jackson's house to the War Office, the question arises, was the destruction such as would exonerate the lessor from his undertaking to surrender the premises at the end of the term, according to the conditions of the contract? This question involves the meaning of the term "inevitable casualties." It is believed that writers upon law define it to be those accidents which happen by the act of God; such as destruction by lightning, tempest, or floods; or such as are produced by a public enemy; or such as happen without any design or negligence, and such as human foresight and prudence could not prevent or control. A fire which produces the destruction of a house, under circumstances like the present case, is said, by the distinguished author upon the law of bailments, to be an inevitable misfortune, an inevitable accident. It is therefore believed that, if the fact be considered as established, that the fire proceeded from the house of Jackson, the United States are not liable to the petitioner under the covenant.

It is not believed, however, by the committee, that the United States are liable, considering the claim of the petitioner upon the principle she places it. It is attempted to be shown by her that the fire originated by design, with a criminal intention to destroy the house and the public papers, either by some person employed in the office, or some other incendiary. If it was destroyed by the former, the Government cannot be considered liable; the principal who employs the agent is liable for injuries sustained by his negligence or omission of duty, but not for the commission of his crimes.

If an officer or agent of the Government, in his official capacity, does an injury to an individual, by neglecting to do that which a man ordinarily attentive to his own business would have done, it is believed the Government ought, perhaps, to be liable; but if one who happens to be in public employment commits acts felonious in themselves, in consequence of which an injury accrues to third persons, it is not believed the Government is liable. If the fire was communicated by the latter, the act itself would be highly criminal in the individual, and for which he might be punished by the criminal law of the country. But it is believed that the civil injury would be merged in the felony; and it is considered doubtful, at least, whether he, if discovered, would be liable for the civil injury; but there can be no doubt, that the Government would not.

Upon the whole, the committee are of opinion that, if an individual stood in the place of the Government in this case, the petitioner, from her own showing, would be without any remedy against him; and they conceive that the rule applicable to the case of individuals is the best to adopt between the Government and individuals; they are of opinion that sound principles of policy and justice require that the prayer of the petitioner be disallowed; they therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

SUSPENSION OF DIRECT TAX, &c.

Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means inquire into the expediency of suspending the collection of direct tax and internal duties in those districts of the State of Massachusetts, which are in possession of the enemy.

The House agreed, 62 to 47, now to consider the resolution.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, who had voted for the consideration of the resolution, desired that the gentleman would state his object.

Mr. WILSON stated that the enemy, having possession of Eastport and Castine, thus possessed the command of territory which belonged to two collection districts; one of the collectors of which resided within the territory thus occupied, and the other just without it, although five-sixths of the territory attached to his district was in possession of the enemy. It was the duty of those collectors, according to law, to proceed in the collection of the duties. These duties, the British Governor, Sherbrooke, as gentlemen had, no doubt, seen in the public papers, had required the collectors to pay over to his officers established at Castine or Eastport; and with this requisition the collectors must comply, or suffer confiscation of their property; on the other hand, they would violate their duty, according to law, if they did not proceed in their collection. He wished to relieve them from this disagreeable alternative, and to put it out of the power of the British Government to tax the people through the intervention of American officers.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, said, there was no novelty in this proposition, as precedents might be found for it in the Journals of the Old Congress. Whenever a district was in possession of the enemy, some provision of this kind ought to be interposed to relieve the people as well as the collectors. Mr. W. was for doing equal justice to all; for considering the people of all parts of the Union as one great family—and, in regard to this question, he was willing to begin with Massachusetts, anything in her denunciations of the General Government to the contrary notwithstanding.

After a few words of explanation from Mr. WILSON, the resolution was agreed to—79 to 42.

TUESDAY, November 1.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the papers lost or destroyed from the Treasury in consequence of the incursion of the enemy on the 24th day of August last; whereby it appears that no papers essential to the adjustment of pending accounts, or of material value, were lost or destroyed.

The resolution "requesting the President of the United States to recommend a day of public humiliation, fasting and prayer," was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to incorporate the Columbian Manufacturing Company of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, being called up by Mr. KENT, of Maryland, passed through a Committee of the

THE FLOTILLA MEN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for allowing compensation to Commodore Barney's officers and men, for the loss of their clothing, &c.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, took occasion to read the following letter he had received from Commodore Barney since this subject was last under consideration:

BALTIMORE, October 30, 1814.

SIR: It was not until this morning that I saw a short sketch of the debate on the "flotilla bill." I was much surprised at what was said on that occasion; for it is well known when orders were given to blow up the flotilla, that the enemy were firing upon them from forty barges with cannon and rockets, and had landed a body of marines at Pig Point, within a mile of the flotilla. The orders from the Secretary of the Navy to me were, to keep the flotilla above the enemy, and if they attempted to march for Washington, to land my men, leaving sufficient to destroy the flotilla if attacked. On Sunday 21st of August, finding the enemy on the road to the Wood Yard, direct for Washington, I landed upwards of four hundred men, leaving only eight men in each barge to take care of them or destroy them as the case might be, but by no means to suffer them to fall into the hands of the enemy; most of the baggage and all the bedding of the men which were landed was left on board, not wishing to encumber my men with much baggage. On Monday morning the 22d, we joined the Army at the Wood Yard, where I found the marine corps and five pieces of heavy artillery, which the Secretary of the Navy had had the precaution to send forward from Washington and place under my command. I need not relate our services afterwards; but when the flotilla was blown up, we, and not the enemy, "were a day's march from it"—of course could not save the baggage. So far from being able to get "further up the river," as was said, the vessels were aground and blown up in that situation; and as to having time to save the baggage, so contrary is the truth, that several of the men were taken prisoners in the act of destroying the flotilla, and still remain so. Much more might be said on this subject, but the Winter coming on imperiously calls for some assistance to these unfortunate men.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOSHUA BARNEY.

Hon. Mr. PLEASANTS.

The amendment pending when this subject was last before the House, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON, the word "officers" was stricken out of the bill—53 to 47. His reason was, that it would set a bad precedent for remuneration of officers in other cases where they should lose baggage, which frequently occurred.

The bill thus amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, November 2.

A new member, to wit: from New Jersey, THOMAS BINES, elected in the place of Jacob Hufty, deceased, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Chester district, South Carolina, remonstrating against the transportation and opening of the mail on the Sabbath, which they consider as injurious to the morals and civil welfare of the people.—Referred to the Committee of Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom like petitions from other quarters have been referred.

The bill for the relief of the petty officers and seamen under the command of Captain Joshua Barney, was read a third time, and passed.

BOUNTY TO PRIVATEERS.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews of privateers, for the vessels of the enemy destroyed at sea, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. R. stated his object, in moving this resolution, to be, in the first place, to operate on the commerce of the enemy; in the second, to preserve to our country the services of the seamen, who, by manning the prize vessels, were frequently captured by the enemy, and as far as possible retained by him in his possession, and withheld from exchange. There were other cogent reasons why such a measure ought to be adopted, viz: to give encouragement to a species of warfare which the enemy most sensibly felt, &c. Whatever were the general impressions of gentlemen in relation to privateering, this measure was peculiarly proper in relation to us, because at present the enemy has all the commerce of the world, and we have none.

The resolution was agreed to nem. con.

WAR MEASURES.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the Government of the United States.

The bill having been read through as far as the section which declares that, after having served out their nine months, they should not be held liable for a longer period—

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, expressed his regret at being called upon to vote partially on the system reported by the Military Committee, of which this was only a subordinate feature. But, in any view, he was desirous to know whether the provision immediately under consideration contemplated the exemption of such persons, in consequence of their nine months' service, from any classification or draught which might apply generally to all the people? Whilst on the one hand it could scarcely be expected to get volunteers unless they were in some degree exempted from militia service by volunteering, it would on the other hand be a fatal objection to this system, if, for nine months' voluntary service, they are to be exempted from all future service or draught. He repeated that it would be desirable to act on the whole system at once, and not first to act on the subsidiary force proposed by this bill, and afterwards on the foundation, the regular force.

Mr. TROUP repeated, that the Military Committee, convened for the purpose, this morning, of deciding whether it would be proper first to act on the two bills which accompanied this bill, had decided that it would be proper for the present to postpone taking up these bills. The reasons which produced this decision were, that the subject of raising men was a very difficult one, inasmuch that it presented, at best, a choice of difficulties. They had understood, also, that there was a probability that, through some channel or other, another plan than that adopted and reported by the Military Committee would be presented to the House. It had been deemed proper to give the House an opportunity of seeing all the plans which could be offered, that they might select the best; that is, the one which should be subject to the fewest difficulties. With this view they had determined to postpone for a few days the consideration of the other bills. As to the section to which the gentleman objected, it had no reference whatever to an exemption from draught, and was perhaps in itself mere surplusage, its object being only to define more accurately the term of service of the proposed force, which was intended to substitute frequent requisitions of militia force, than which it was believed this would be a more efficient, and probably, from its protracted term of service, a much cheaper force. The subject of general or partial exemption from draught, would properly enter, if deemed expedient, into the general classification bill.

Mr. LOWNDES rejoined, that to the particular section under consideration, as explained by Mr. TROUP, he had no sort of objection.

Mr. TROUP moved to strike out nine months (the proposed term of service) and insert twelve.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, opposed the motion, because he said nine months was enough for one campaign, and twelve months too little for two. If the time was extended, he should prefer eighteen months, which should embrace two campaigns.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, assigned the reason why the Committee on Military Affairs had determined to propose to change the term of service from nine to twelve months. It was, that three months might be afforded for discipline and instruction in the evolutions necessary in the face of an enemy before they were called into the field; and the remaining nine months would cover a Summer and Fall campaign.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Kentucky, said he should vote against the proposed amendment, because he was desirous of inserting eighteen in lieu of twelve months. He believed that corps of this description might be as easily obtained for eighteen months or two years as for any other term; and the longer the period of their service the more useful they would certainly be.

Mr. TROUP said he should be glad if the gentlemen from the Western country would settle this question among themselves. They best knew what term of service would be most agreeable. The object was to get the men; and the period most agreeable to those disposed to enter the service would certainly be the best.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, stated that the Military Committee proposed the period of twelve months as the minimum of service—the men would, according to the bill, if amended as proposed, serve not less than twelve months—which period certainly embraced a longer term of service, if it should be found as easy to obtain the men under it.

The motion to strike out nine and insert twelve was agreed to—57 to 55.

The bill having been further amended and the blanks filled—

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, inquired, whether it had been the intention of the Military Committee that single regiments only should be raised of this description of force? If otherwise, whether any provision was intended to be made for general officers?

Mr. TROUP replied, that that was a point which the Committee had not taken under consideration; as the bill now stood, it only contemplated the acceptance of these volunteers by regiments, battalions, and companies, who would of course be placed, when necessary, from their numbers or the nature of the service, under regular general officers.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, moved to add as an amendment to the bill a new section in nearly the following words:

"And he it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, whose services are accepted under the authority of this act, who shall serve for two years, shall be exempted from militia service during the present war."

Mr. TROUP suggested the propriety of deferring a motion of this kind until the bill for classification should be taken up, when it would be properly determined who should and who should not be exempt from its operation. What would be the effect of such a provision in this bill on any future act respecting the militia, he could not, nor could any person now determine. He therefore thought the subject would come more fairly and properly before the House, when the other bill should be taken up.

Mr. FORSYTH said it was impossible for him to say what would be done in relation to the bill his colleague had alluded to. Whether the bill would ever pass the House he could not say. The tendency of the proposition he had offered would be to increase the length of the term of service—to induce a great number to engage for two years instead of one. If he could be certain the bill in question would pass, and if it did pass, that such a provision as this would be attached to it, Mr. F. said he would withdraw his motion. But as these points were both doubtful, he must insist on his motion.

Mr. TROUP then said he would state candidly

Provision for Collectors.

H. OF R.

the point of his objection to this motion. The bill now under consideration was not intended to substitute that particular kind of force which this House must rely mainly on for the prosecution of the war. If it was intended to substitute a volunteer for a regular force, such a provision would be well worthy of consideration. But so long as he hoped no one entertained such an idea, he feared such an amendment as this would, at the same time that it would make the amount of volunteer force unnecessarily great, tend to diminish the amount of the regular force which might be raised by draught, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he was sorry to differ from the chairman of the Military Committee in relation to this amendment. He thought it a very proper one. It would afford a great inducement to persons to volunteer for two years; and it was his opinion, Mr. J. said, that volunteers for two years were as efficient a force as any we could have, and equal in every respect to regular force. If we had an army of an hundred thousand men of this description, we should not want a single regular soldier.

Mr. FORSYTH said, in reply to the argument, that too many volunteers might be called forth by such a provision, that the President had the power to limit the number.

The amendment of Mr. FORSYTH was adopted by the following vote, viz: For the amendment, 64; against it, 51.

On motion of Mr. RICH, of Vermont, the daily compensation of the volunteers was changed from twenty-six and two-third cents to thirty-three and one-third cents per day.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, moved to extend to privates killed during the service, the same provisions for the relief of their widows and children, as is provided in the bill for officers' families.

To this motion it was objected, by Mr. TROUP, that to adopt this amendment would be to place privates in this corps on a different footing from privates in any other corps in the service of the United States, in regard to whom the Senate had uniformly rejected every provision of the kind proposed by this House.

The motion of Mr. KILBOURN was negatived—35 only rising in favor of it.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill. The several amendments made in Committee of the Whole were concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of New York, the bill was further amended, in that part providing land bounty to accrue when discharged, so as to read "when honorably discharged."

Mr. KILBOURN renewed the motion he had unsuccessfully made in Committee of the Whole, remarking that he did not believe it had been understood by many gentlemen, and spoke in support of it.

The motion was now decided in the affirmative—yeas 88.

The bill having been further amended—

On the suggestion of Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, that he desired to propose an amendment going to place volunteers, during the war, on the same terms as to bounty in money and land as our other troops; which amendment he desired time to prepare; the bill was ordered to lie on the table till to-morrow.

THURSDAY, November 3.

Another member, to wit: from Virginia, DANIEL SHEFFEY, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, reported without amendment the bill from the Senate to authorize the President to cause to be purchased or built the vessels therein described; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, said, having observed that there was much difficulty in filling the ranks of the Army, and believing that to attain that highly important object, nothing could more greatly conduce than a provision for the families of those who die in the service, he had been induced to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the relief of the widows and children of all such non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, as shall be killed, or die of wounds received in the public service, in any of the corps composing the Army of the United States.

After some conversation, in the course of which it appeared that a resolution embracing partially the objects of this motion, had been passed in the early part of the session—the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The House resumed the consideration of the volunteer bill; which was amended, on motion of Mr. TROUP, so as to authorize the acceptance of volunteers for the war, to receive the same bounty and in other respects to be placed on the same footing as persons enlisted for the war. And, thus amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PROVISION FOR COLLECTORS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, offered for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making some provision for the support of such collectors and other officers of the customs, as are deprived of it by the war."

This motion was objected to by Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, on the ground that this was an improper mode of proceeding; if the persons holding sub-offices cannot be satisfied with their emoluments, they had the option to resign; on the other hand, if the emoluments were too small it was for the Government to recommend their increase.

To this, Mr. INGERSOLL replied, that, if the subject were inquired into, it would be found, that so far from affording a support, many of the offices of the revenue were a burden on those holding them, and a tax on their private resources. Such certainly was not the intention of Congress in constituting the offices, and it rested with the House to say whether they would not examine into the subject.

The resolution was rejected by a large majority.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, called up the bill to amend the judiciary system, in which he was particularly interested, on account of a provision it contains respecting the further enforcing the revenue laws and strengthening the hands of those whose duty it is to prevent intercourse with the enemy.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, who reported the bill, was opposed to acting on it at present; because, on account of the importance of several features of that bill, he was desirous, before it was acted on, to consult the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court and others, and if he could, to obtain their assistance and support to it, &c.

This order of the day was postponed; and no other business being brought forward, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, November 4.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS,

Resolved, That a Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary for the Department of State to cause the Laws of the United States, passed or to be passed during the present or any future session of the Congress of the United States, to be printed in two of the public newspapers in each of the Territories of the United States, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. JENNINGS, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. SHIPHERD, Mr. PICKENS, and Mr. FARROW, were appointed a committee.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, presented the petition of an inhabitant of Fairfax county, Virginia, praying compensation for a horse belonging to him, forcibly taken from him during the late incursion of the enemy to this place by an officer of the United States; and also the petition of Thomas Ewell, manager and principal proprietor of the Anacosta bridge, (over the Anacosta or Eastern Branch,) praying indemnification for the loss sustained by the burning of that bridge by the Government officers.—Referred to Committee of Claims.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, reported a bill "establishing the Bank of the Metropolis," (in this District;) which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, called up the resolution offered by him yesterday, and then laid on the table, directing the Military Committee to consider the expediency of providing for the families of private soldiers slain in service.

Mr. K. modified his motion so as to embrace only regular soldiers and volunteers engaged in the service, excluding the case of militia, which has already been referred to the Military Committee; and, so modified, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, gave notice that, if opportunity offered, he would to-morrow call up the bill for classifying the male population of the United States.

THE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, called the attention of the House to the resolution appointing a committee to investigate the capture of this city. He had been, and yet was, very anxious to hear the report of that committee. The chairman of that committee (Mr. JOHNSON) had the other day assigned the reason why the report of that committee had been delayed, which was, that letters had been written to Generals Armstrong and Winder, to which answers had not yet been received. With submission to the committee, he knew not why application had been made to those sources for information. Did they expect those persons to furnish proofs of their own imbecility or misconduct?

[Mr. S. was proceeding, when the SPEAKER reminded him there was no motion before the House.]

Mr. S. then moved that the committee be requested to make a report on this subject as early as possible, notwithstanding they may not have received answers to all the letters they had written.

Whilst Mr. S. was reducing this motion to writing—

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, suggested to the gentleman the propriety of deferring his motion until the chairman of the committee of investigation should be in his seat, which he was not at present.

Mr. SMITH said he had no objection to defer his motion for the present; and, indeed, if the gentleman from Kentucky would be good enough to communicate his sentiments on this subject to his colleague, it might save the necessity of making the motion at all. The crisis to which our affairs had arrived required, he said, a prompt examination of such events as that which had occurred at this place.

THE VOLUNTEER BILL.

The bill to authorize the President to accept the services of volunteer corps, which shall associate and organize themselves, was announced for a third reading.

Mr. IRVING, of New York, for reasons which he assigned, moved to recommit this bill. His objections were principally to the clause which allowed a compensation of six cents and a quarter per day, or twenty-two dollars and eighty-one cents a year, or double that sum for two years, to such persons as should arm themselves, for the use of arms, inasmuch as the arms could be purchased by the United States and put into their hands for a less sum; and to the provision which allowed the volunteers a greater per diem compensation for their services than was now allowed to the regulars.

Mr. TROUP objected to the recommitment on these grounds; for, although he might not be wholly pleased with some features of the bill, he did not know that they would be improved by recommitment, which would consume much time. In reply to the objection to the compensation to those who arm themselves, he said it would have much more weight if the United States were able conveniently to furnish them; which, however, was not the fact, &c.

The Volunteer Bill.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, and Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, favored the recommitment, on account of the section which exempts two years' volunteers from all further militia duty, to which they both had decided objections.

Mr. TROUP admitted in some degree the force of these objections to a provision, the insertion of which he had himself opposed. And, on the question being taken, the bill was recommitted to a Committee of the Whole.

A short time afterwards, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on said bill.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, moved to amend the bill, by striking out the clause authorizing the volunteers to be commissioned by the States, as well as by the Government of the United States. His object was to obtain uniformity in the service, and in the grades of commissions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed the motion from various reasons; the principal of which were, that the Governors of States disposed to co-operate with the General Government, having better opportunities of information of personal character in their States, would better know how to dispose of commissions properly; that there were persons whose situation might be incompatible with holding commissions under the United States, who would not be precluded from accepting commissions from the States, &c. On the other hand, volunteers might be obtained in some States hostile to the General Government, and disposed to commission the officers; for which case, it was proposed commissions should be given by the United States.

Mr. KILBOURN, yielding to the force of one or the other of Mr. JOHNSON's reasons, withdrew his motion.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, renewed it. He did so, on the ground that there was no law or clause of the Constitution to authorize the commissioning of these volunteers by the States. The volunteers to be raised by this bill were not, and could not be considered as militia, but, so long as they were in service, as a part of the Army of the United States, under a peculiar organization.

This motion was debated at some length. The affirmative side of the question was maintained by Messrs. WEBSTER, GROSVENOR, of New York, and INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, and the negative by Messrs. JACKSON, of Virginia, and SHARP, of Kentucky.

This discussion turned principally on the distinction between militia and State corps, and soldiers, whether enlisted or voluntarily engaged, whether regulars or volunteers. On one hand, it was contended that the Governors had constitutionally no right to commission volunteers in the service of the States; and, on the other, that Congress could by law give them the power to commission them as militia volunteers, and then receive them into the service of the United States.

The motion to strike out the words "or by the States," from that clause which directs the manner in which the officers shall be commissioned, was finally agreed to—ayes 89.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, followed up this amendment by a motion to strike out so much of the bill as authorizes the volunteers to choose their own officers. Such an amendment, he said, would be merely formal, because the indication of the wishes of the volunteers, in this respect, would still doubtless regulate the appointments; but it appeared to him necessarily to follow the amendment already made.

Mr. JOHNSON expressed his fears of the effect of these amendments, particularly of the latter, in entirely defeating the intention of the bill. Besides spreading a host of officers over the country, without men to command, the effect of the amendment will be to tie up the will and energies of the people, which had never yet been fairly appealed to, and again to resort to inefficient measures. The amendment now proposed, he argued, would take the soul out of this bill, and destroy its utility.

Mr. LOWNDES, in reply to the objection to this amendment that it would create an army of officers, said there was no fear, certainly, that the President would commission officers before men were enrolled for their command.

This motion again gave rise to a considerable debate, in the course of which it was opposed with much warmth and force by Messrs. J. G. JACKSON, TROUP, and ROBERTSON, and advocated by Messrs. LOWNDES and PICKERING.

In addition to what is already stated, the principal argument in favor of one motion, was the alleged inability of Congress to place the power of appointing officers to command troops of the United States in any other hands than those of the Executive. To this argument, it was said in reply, that it might be allowed to have some weight, if the President had no election to accept or refuse the proffered services of volunteers thus organized; but, after the selection by the volunteers, the power of confirmation still remained with the Executive, and he was at liberty to accept or reject the corps so organized. Gentlemen opposed to the force contemplated to be raised by the bill, were entreated not to propose amendments to it which would entirely destroy any efficiency it might have according to the original plan.

Mr. LOWNDES's motion having been rejected—Mr. IRVING, of New York, moved to strike out thirty-three and a third cents, the daily compensation proposed to be allowed, and reinstate twenty-six and two-thirds, the rate originally contained in the bill.

This motion was opposed by Mr. RICH, of Vermont, and Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, on the ground that, no bounty being allowed to these volunteers, their pay ought to be higher than that of the regulars.

The motion of Mr. IRVING was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. IRVING also moved to reduce the per diem allowance of six and a quarter cents to each man for use of the arms with which the volunteers shall supply themselves; this allowance he conceived to be now too great. This motion was, after some remarks of Messrs. TROUP and JACKSON in opposition to it, likewise negatived by a large majority.

Mr. CANNON, of Tennessee, made a motion going to require the volunteers to be uniformly armed; which motion, having been opposed by Mr. TROUP and Mr. JOHNSON as unnecessary and inexpedient, was negatived.

Other amendments were proposed and negatived.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, then moved to strike out the section of the bill which proposes exemption from future militia service for all those who shall volunteer for two years. Mr. C. advocated the motion, on the grounds before stated in objection to it by Mr. WEBSTER and himself.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed this motion, but suggested a modification of the provision, so that the volunteer who has served for two years shall not be liable to militia draught until the whole body of the militia in his State have served for a like term.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, moved an amendment, embodying the idea of his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, which, however, was not in order until the pending question was decided.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, warmly opposed this motion, and replied to those who advocated it. Without this provision, the inducements held out in the bill were not sufficient to call forth any number of volunteers; and he denied the validity of any of the objections which had been brought against it.

Some further debate took place, when Mr. CALHOUN's motion was agreed to, and the committee agreed to strike out this section.

Mr. HAWKINS then renewed the motion he had before offered, which was agreed to.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, then proposed an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to authorize the President to receive into the service of the United States volunteer corps organized under the authority of the States.

On this motion, the Committee of the Whole being equally divided, the Chairman decided it in the negative.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill; and the House immediately adjourned.

SATURDAY, November 5.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL DAVIS, appeared, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the Indiana Territory, enclosing the credentials of JONATHAN JENNINGS, as the Delegate for that Territory in the Fourteenth Congress.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they had passed the three million loan bill, with amendments. On motion of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, (the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means being absent from indisposition.) the bill and amendments were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

TAX ON SALARIES, &c.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying a duty on all salary officers, and on the professional income of lawyers, solicitors, and counsellors, and the legal proceedings of civil courts of justice.

Mr. F. said it appeared to him while Congress were engaged in devising taxes on every description of articles, there were a number of officers under high salaries, paying comparatively no taxes to the Government, whom he thought ought to be taxed in some way. While we are taxing the poor man who has but an hundred acres of land, and from that has besides to maintain a large family, where is the propriety, Mr. F. asked, of exempting a man who receives annual thousands, and, after maintaining his family, can lay up a large part of it? The object of Mr. F. was to lay a certain per centage on the salary. As to the income of lawyers, &c., he thought them equally worthy of taxation, &c.

The motion of Mr. FARROW was agreed to without a division.

THE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he understood that, in his absence from the House yesterday, an honorable member from New York had expressed some anxiety to know what progress had been made by the committee appointed to investigate the causes of the capture of this city by the enemy, in the execution of that duty. In obedience to the direction of the committee on that subject, who at all times were anxious and willing to satisfy any honorable member of the House in his reasonable inquiries, he now rose to state that they had not been idle in the discharge of the duties committed to them. But, on a subject so interesting and so important, it would have been improper in them to present an imperfect development of events which had been the foundation of so many different rumors. And to enable the House to judge of the labor imposed on this committee, he made the following statement of the papers before that committee, &c.

Communications received by the Committee of Investigation, viz:

1st. General Winder's report, accompanied with one hundred and twenty-three letters to Governors of States, regular and militia officers, &c., pp. 96.

2d. Report from the War Department, sheets 34.

3d. Reports from the Navy Department, accompanied by twenty-one letters to various officers and persons, pp. 32.

4th. Report of General Smith of District militia, accompanied with a few letters, pp. 23.

5th. General Armstrong's letter, accompanied by two or three letters, pp. 20.

6th. Richard Rush's report, pp. 21.

Thirty-five letters from various persons, (General Hungerford, Colonel Tayloe, Captain Caldwell, Captain Burch, &c.) upon subjects relating to the object of the inquiry, making together eleven reports, containing three hundred and fifty-nine pages, and two hundred and ten letters, besides daily and almost hourly interviews with persons upon the subject.

Letters and reports yet expected.

Letters from Colonel Monroe, Walter Jones, William Pinkney, General Van Ness, General Stansbury; an estimate of the public property destroyed at the Navy Yard; a letter from General Douglass; the proceedings of the court martial over Captain Dyson; a letter from John Law, &c.

This statement and enumeration, Mr. J. said he hoped would satisfy the gentleman from New York and the House that the committee have not unnecessarily delayed a report. They would make a report at as early a day as was consistent with a due discharge of their duty.

PETITION OF THOMAS CUTTS.

The House, on motion of Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Thomas Cutts, of the District of Maine. Further evidence on the claim was read. Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, Mr. PICKENS, of the same State, Mr. ALEXANDER, of Ohio, and Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, spoke in favor of the report of the committee, (unfavorable to the petitioner,) which was opposed by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, Mr. HULBERT, of Massachusetts, Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, and Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York.

This was strictly a legal discussion, and conducted with great ability on both sides, and at considerable length. The case is as follows: Mr. Cutts purchased at a marshal's sale certain property, of which he was dispossessed in due process of law by a third person. He prays of the United States reimbursement of money paid to their officer for the purchase aforesaid and interest thereon, together with costs incurred in defending the suit.

The question, on the amendment going to reverse the report of the committee, was at length decided in the negative. For the amendment 55, against it 79.

The question on concurring in the report of the committee was then decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays. For the report 81, against it 58, as follows:

THE VOLUNTEER BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the services of such volunteer corps as shall organize themselves and offer their services to the President of the United States.

The amendments having been all agreed to, until that came under consideration which goes to strike out the twelfth section, which is in the following words:

"And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, accepted under the authority of this act, who shall serve two years in the Army of the United States, shall be exempted from militia duty during the present war."

On the question to strike out this section, to which he was decidedly opposed, Mr. HAWKINS required the yeas and nays.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, opposed the erasure of this section. He deplored the errors of a false economy, which had pervaded the measures of Congress from the commencement of the war, and which he saw with regret in the determination to withhold this, the only inducement to volunteer under this bill. The section proposed to introduce no new principle; for exemptions were already recognised by law in particular cases, and in none more rightfully than this. If they went on by scanty means, as they had heretofore done, the war might continue not only two years, but ten times two, &c.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, spoke at some length, and with much force in favor of retaining this section, which he believed vital to the utility of the bill. He addressed himself to the majority of the House; for, as to the minority, they were opposed to the Administration and to war, and could not be expected to go along with those who supported either. What, said he, do we now want? We want soldiers, and expect to obtain them under this bill, and under another of a more energetic character now before this House. Appeals to the patriotism of the country, to volunteers, said Mr. H., are beautiful in sound; they please the ear; but, when brought to the test, this species of patriotic spirit may be worn out by too severe a pressure. If Government rests its claims to the services of its citizens exclusively on the patriotism of the country, in the time of most need they will be found most wanting. In particular sections of the country, particular classes of men had borne the brunt of the war by voluntary contributions of service, as far as they could so bear it. There was scarcely a man of any standing in the Western country who had not contributed in some way his personal services in support of a war which he believed to be righteous and just. Let future calls on their patriotism be made in such manner as to convince them the Government does not wish to tax exclusively their patriotism. Mr. H. then examined the inducements of land bounty, and pay held out by this bill, which, he said, were no temptation to the hardy backwoodsman of the West, who by laboring one-fourth of his time can earn a subsistence for his family, &c. He then made a few remarks on the military services already rendered by the citizens of the Western States, where these men were expected to be had; that portion of the country was already exhausted by the services they had frequently and successively rendered. It was impossible, therefore, that any large force could be collected under this bill, even retaining the section which had been stricken out in Committee of the Whole. But if gentlemen persisted in calling upon men for a contribution of voluntary services, not to defend their homes, but to fight our battles, to march here and there, without appealing to other inducements than patriotism and bravery, they would only deceive themselves and the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, remarked that the military force by which we can operate consists of two descriptions; the regular force, whose general character is mercenary, the soldiers enlisting for the sake of the bounty and subsistence; draughted militia called into service under legal obligations; and volunteers, brought into the field by patriotic motives only. If volunteers were to be obtained only by the greatness of the inducements or the amount of compensation held out, why call for volunteers at all? Mr. C. said he would not consent to derogate from the motives of those who volunteer by supposing them to be altogether actuated by such motives. There were temptations of one kind held out to those who enlist in the regular Army, and of another to those who volunteer. Love of country is the boast, it is the jewel of the volunteer corps. They are unfit for the tug of war, for its drudgery and fatigue. They are peculiarly adapted to cases of emergency, of great personal danger, but not great fatigue. We must rely on regulars to be enlisted, and, if not to be had in sufficient numbers, on those who shall be draughted from the whole body of the militia. These two constitute the bone and muscle of the Army. If great reliance had been placed on a volunteer force, why had another bill been reported by the Military Committee, with extraordinary provisions for filling the ranks of the Army? Certainly, the volunteers had only been considered a co-operating or subsidiary force, the regulars being the basis. A body of volunteers for instance, might individually and collectively, possess the same spirit as the little army under General Brown, but they could not be expected to render the same kind of services.

Mr. FRISK, of Vermont, said that the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, extended a little farther, would favor the denial of any compensation to volunteers for their service. The gentleman would then see, how many patriotism alone would induce to take the field for two years. Volunteers, Mr. F. said, were of the same materials as regulars, if not better. None of Brown's army had been in service two years, many of them not six months, and yet they have covered themselves with glory, and established the national character. Under the guidance of men who know how to bring into action the military spirit with which the country was universally inspired—under such men as Brown, volunteers would soon be fitted for the "tug of war."

Mr. BARNETT, of Georgia, said he was in favor of the war, and always had been, and yet he was in favor of striking out this section. In old times, he said, the patriotism of the people had burnt till its objects were answered; now it seems patriotism is to be burnt out in two years. He hoped, however, it never would be extinguished until we obtain the object of the war. He was in favor of the war, he said, and was in hopes we were to fight it out with ball and powder—we are now fighting it with words and wind, and never shall bring it to a conclusion if we spend so much time in talking about it. Mr. B. concluded by saying he was opposed to exemption in any way.

Mr. DUVALL, of Kentucky, asked whether, after faithfully serving his country for two years, a volunteer was to be told, his patriotism was not worth a rush because it had not carried him to the end of the war? Let gentlemen place themselves in the situation of the volunteer. Why not serve the nation here from motives of pure and unadulterated patriotism? If we have so much of it on our tongue, why not a little in practice? The members of this House, he presumed, were in general more wealthy than the volunteers. Let them begin with themselves, and then preach disinterested patriotism to others; their doctrines would then be much more attended to than now that they talked of patriotism, and pocketed the per diem. Patriotism will not feed a man; it is most of it air, and, however anxious to serve his country by fighting, a man must eat, and all the patriotism of the world will not enable him to dispense with it. The bill contained no temptations to the service, he said, save the section which is proposed to be stricken out. When a man, after two years' service, came home seamed with honorable scars, was he to be liable the next day to be again called into the field? This, he said, would be the monstrous effect of striking out the section. But this species of troops, it appeared, was not fit for the tug of war. This Mr. D. denied. They have given evidence of their ability to bear every hardship. In the campaign on the Wabash, in the depth of Winter, they had marched barefoot without complaining. From the severe battle of Massissiniway, how many had returned who were not frostbitten? The men who will volunteer have no idea of enlisting; you come at a species of force to be had in no other way, and as effective as any in any scene of action but in the open field, which must be contested by military art alone. He did not believe more than ten thousand at the utmost could be got by this bill; but if we had a hundred thousand such men, officered by such officers as Brown, Scott, and Gaines, divided into three armies, they would end the war in a single season, by conquering the whole of the enemy's adjacent provinces, the post of Quebec perhaps alone excepted, &c. He hoped therefore this section, the main inducement to volunteers, would not be stricken out.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, was clearly of opinion that, in consequence of their service, the volunteers ought to be entitled by law to some exemption from militia service, but not so far as this bill proposed to go. The section which had been substituted, in Committee of the Whole, for that now under consideration, (going to exempt them until all the other militia in their district shall have served an equal term,) he thought went far enough. But if the war continued, ten, fifteen, or twenty years, would gentlemen require the main body of the militia to do duty two, three, or four years, and continue the exemption in favor of those volunteers who shall have served only two years? Mr. G. said he could not agree to do so.

The question on striking out the section before recited, was then decided: For striking out 105, against it 43, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Burwell, Caperton, Clalhoun, Cannon, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clark, Clopton, Cooper, Crawford, Crouch, Cuthbert, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Earle, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gordin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Hulbert, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Leferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lyle, Markell, McKim, Moore, Moseley, Newton, Oakley, Parker, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Pleasants, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith of New York, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stuart, Surges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tannehill, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Bines, Bowen, Butler, Caldwell, Condict, Conard, Creighton, Desha, Duvall, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawkins, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kilbourn, Lowndes, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Nelson, Ormsby, Piper, John Reed, Rich, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Strong, Telfair, and Yancey.

This question having been carried, the section reported in lieu of it, going to exempt all volunteers who shall serve two years under this act from being in future called into military service until all other militiamen in their States or districts shall have served for two years, was read.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, moved an amendment to this section, to strike out "two years" in each instance, and insert in lieu thereof "one year," or any longer term which the volunteers may engage to serve.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, embodied Mr. JACKSON'S amendment in the following form, which Mr. J. accepted as his motion:

"That any volunteer whose service shall be accepted under this act shall be exempt from any military service until all the militia in any State or Territory in which he resides shall have served a tour of duty equal to that which the said volunteer shall have served."

After a short debate, this motion to amend was negatived—54 to 47.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of Vermont, the section reported by the Committee was amended by striking out those words which have the effect to exempt such volunteers from subsequent service, whenever the militia are called out en masse.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, denying the Constitutional power of Congress, to preclude the States from making use of the militia for State purposes, moved an amendment to the section, going to make the volunteers therein mentioned liable still to State calls for militia.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, called the attention of Mr. GROSVENOR to one of the earliest acts of the General Government, to exempt certain persons (public officers) from militia duty, which fact overturned the whole of the gentleman's arguments on this head.

This remark of Mr. JACKSON'S was applied to others, who took side with Mr. GROSVENOR, and some debate took place on it.

On the question, Mr. GROSVENOR'S amendment was agreed to by a majority of two or three votes.

The question being stated on the adoption of the new section reported by the Committee as amended, the yeas and nays thereon were required by Mr. WEBSTER.

At length a motion for adjournment was made and carried.

MONDAY, November 7.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, asked and obtained leave to report a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America; which was twice read by its title, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

PETITION OF JOHN CHALMERS.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a favorable report on the petition of John Chalmers, who asks of Congress reimbursement of certain expenditures made by him in manufacturing certain cordage for the United States, which, together with the rope-walk, were burnt at Baltimore on the approach of the enemy, by order of the Commanding General. The committee also reported a bill for the relief of John Chalmers, which was twice read, and, together with the report, referred to a Committee of the whole House.

The report is as follows:

That, on the 29th of March, 1814, the petitioner and the Secretary of the Navy entered into a contract for the manufacture of cordage for the United States' frigate Java, upon the following terms: the Navy Department was to furnish him at Baltimore with Russia hemp and Kentucky yarn in such quantities as might be found convenient, and he should require, which was to be manufactured in good navy cordage, sufficient for the complete equipment of the frigate. For every pound of hemp and yarn delivered to the petitioner he was to return a pound of cordage to the Navy agent, free from expense to the United States; so that his profit and compensation for his labor and art in manufacturing consisted in the difference in the weight of the hemp and yarns, increased by the quantity of tar used in the manufacture. It was also understood by the Secretary of the Navy and Mr. Chalmers, that the raw material, thus delivered, was to be at the risk of the United States, in the event of loss by fire.

The petitioner commenced manufacturing the cordage, and had prepared and delivered to the Navy agent at Baltimore upwards of nine tons, and had a considerable quantity ready to deliver, when, on the approach of the enemy towards Baltimore, in the month of September last, the rope-walks in which the cordage was manufacturing and then deposited, was set on fire by order of General Forman, who then commanded the Maryland militia at that place; in consequence of which the rope-walks were destroyed, and, with them, about thirty tons of Russia hemp, belonging to the Government, and all the labor and profit of the petitioner, except that part of the hemp which had been delivered. He asks of Congress to reimburse him to the amount of his actual expenditures, in the purchase of tar, and the money which he has paid to persons employed in the manufacture of the cordage.

The committee are not in possession of facts which would authorize them to determine whether the destruction of this property was necessary; if it was not, however much they might regret and deprecate that work, yet they are of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, the individual who sustained the loss should at least be reimbursed by the Government to the amount of his claim. They, therefore, report by bill, and submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition is reasonable, and ought to be allowed.

THE VOLUNTEER BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Volunteer bill.

The question depending at time of adjournment, viz: on the adoption of the section exempting the two years' volunteers "from draught or other militia duty" at the call of the United States, until all the militia within their States have served—having been again stated,

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, moved to amend it so as to read, that any volunteer who shall serve for two years, "shall not thereafter be enrolled in the militia or subject to draught or any other militia duty during the present war," unless when the militia shall be called out en masse.

The motion of Mr. FISK was opposed by Messrs. PITKIN, of Connecticut, BARNETT, of Georgia, and McKEE, of Kentucky, and advocated by the mover, and Messrs. WRIGHT, of Maryland, RHEA, of Tennessee, and BARBOUR.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, said he hoped the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. FISK) would be adopted, which exempted volunteers who served the United States two years from military service, pending the war, except for the defence of the State, or when they were called out en masse, as it was the only inducement held out for volunteers to tender their services. He viewed them as a valuable description of force, particularly if they joined the service for eighteen months or two years. What was the object for introducing this bill? Certainly, to obtain speedily a formidable force, not to act as the body of your Army, but as an auxiliary to the regular force. No; I am for depending principally on regulars. What is the encouragement held out by the provisions of this bill for men to offer their services? Very inconsiderable, indeed. You give them no bounty in land, nor money; not even clothing for the first six months. You give them the poor pittance of the monthly pay. Can gentlemen calculate on obtaining a considerable number of volunteers on these terms? If they do, they will be most egregiously mistaken. Men cannot live on the wind; they must have something more substantial. They must have something to sustain their families on while they are fighting the battles of their country. The price of common labor is from thirteen to fifteen dollars per month; and can gentlemen expect that men, possessing the virtue, the integrity, and enterprise of your people, (I mean the yeomanry, of whom the volunteer corps must be composed,) will leave their peaceable homes and families to encounter the toils and difficulties incident to a military life, unless the necessary inducements are held out? Thus, all men who make their calculations for a living. You must meet their calculations, or you do not obtain them; particularly when they are to obtain no credit for patriotic exertions, which, I am to conclude, is the case from the manner in which some gentlemen have expressed themselves, by saying that they would not give anything for patriotism that would not last longer than two years' service. Gentlemen are doing their country a serious injury by such expressions, and acting parsimoniously. Be liberal in your encouragements, and, my word for it, you will succeed in obtaining a formidable volunteer force. Corps of this description must be formidable when they are composed of the best materials. But the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) tells you that this description of force cannot stand the tug of war, and appears, from the manner he has expressed himself on this bill, as if he had no confidence in them. And does the gentleman prove that they cannot stand the tug of war, by referring you to the volunteers under General Porter, who have, during this campaign, signalized themselves in the different conflicts with the enemy on the Niagara frontier—who stood and fought, side by side, with General Brown's regulars, and signalized themselves so nobly? If they did not, Congress have acted very inconsistently in giving them their thanks for their bravery and activity, and awarding a medal to their General for his gallantry. Does the gentleman prove it by referring you to the Tennessee volunteers, who, under the gallant Jackson, endured almost incalculable difficulties and hardships, and surmounted all obstacles in the Creek war? Or did the gentleman undertake to prove it by referring you to Governor Shelby's volunteers, who, to the amount of thirty-five hundred, met on a few days' notice, joined the standard of the brave and patriotic Shelby, and travelled three hundred miles to Lake Erie? On the command of the General, they abandoned their horses, and crossed the Lake, where it was forty miles wide, principally in small brittle boats, pursued the enemy one hundred miles into the interior of their country and took them; and, with the aid of a regiment of volunteers commanded by my worthy colleague, killed and took prisoners the British army commanded by General Proctor, and defeated the Indians with considerable slaughter. They quartered eight or nine days on the enemy, living for that time on beef, without bread or salt; wading waters, in some instances nearly half a mile, up to the waist. All this was done by the volunteers, without tents to keep them from the storms, without Government advancing them a single cent of money, and done too without a murmur; and yet these are the description of forces, agreeably to the favorite phrase of the gentleman from South Carolina, that cannot stand the tug of war. Mr. D. said the volunteers had done everything of a decisive character that has been done from the time of the declaration of war until this campaign, and participated in it, but are to receive no credit for their patriotic exertions, agreeably to the declarations of the gentleman from Georgia. (Mr. FORSYTH) who has told you that it was not patriotic motives that induced the Kentuckians to volunteer and go into Canada, but from a principle of revenge. Mr. D. said this was not the fact; whoever undertakes to judge without knowing, is very apt to find himself in an error. If that gentleman had travelled through Kentucky; had made himself acquainted with the habits, dispositions, and principles of the people, he would know they were above the low, malignant principle of revenge. He would know that their exertions have arisen from the purest of motives, from a real love of country, the pure principle of patriotism, and not from the low principle of revenge. The truly brave are always humane; they soar above any grovelling motives, and that gentleman ought to have made himself better acquainted with the different sections of the country, before he undertook to speak so freely. Such expressions, I conceive, were not warranted by the occasion; they are calculated to do a serious injury. If men who have done their country signal services from pure patriotic motives, (for pay was scarcely a consideration with them,) are to be treated thus lightly, it will perhaps have the effect to make them withhold their services when they are wanting. Mr. D. said we must have men of some description or give up the contest, which no American ought to think of. Militia cannot be deemed an efficient force, and they were certainly the most expensive. The kind of economy, or rather the want of economy, pursued, of having hundreds of thousands of militia under arms at a time, would bankrupt the nation. He did not wish the volunteers contemplated to be raised under the provisions of this bill, to be entirely relied on; we must rely principally on regulars. But he was satisfied, that under proper regulations they might be made a formidable auxiliary force to co-operate with the regular Army. He wished the ranks of the regular Army immediately filled, but he saw but little prospect of it from the slow progress of business. We have been in session seven weeks, and what have we done? Nothing. From the indecisive course, the indisposition manifested to despatch business, he thought there was but little prospect of anything of a decisive character being done shortly, calculated to meet the emergency; for that reason, he wished proper encouragement given to induce volunteer corps to tender their services, that they might be ready to act in case of an emergency. The bill as it now stands is scarcely worth preserving; you cannot succeed under it to any considerable extent; hence the necessity of adopting the amendment under consideration. Mr. D. said there was a necessity of doing something speedily. A powerful enemy was, as it were, at your doors. To act indecisively, under existing circumstances, was tantamount to acting criminally. At a time as perilous as the present, hesitation was almost inevitable destruction. You must lay aside your temporizing, theoretical, or visionary projects. They will not do any longer. If the Councils of the nation, at a time as perilous as the present, are to be conducted by theoretical characters, proposing and advocating visionary projects, I am afraid the Government will be ultimately conducted to ruin. You must pick up the old fashioned plain matter of fact, common sense; you must adopt energetic measures, and adopt them promptly, if you wish to preserve your rights and save the nation.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he apprehended there was not a member of the House who had misunderstood him, besides the gentleman from Kentucky. It was very far from his intention to cast the slightest imputation on the volunteers from Kentucky, or on any other of our citizens who had volunteered their services. He estimated the value of their services and the purity of their motives as highly as any gentleman in the House. He did say, and he was prepared to repeat, that patriotism was not the only leading inducement to their energetic conduct. But for the transactions on the river Raisin, he believed those volunteers would not have turned out in such numbers as they did. They were governed by motives of resentment against a savage and brutal foe. They were, as he had said on a former occasion, stimulated by revenge—not that dark passion the gentleman alludes to, but the revenge which governs noble minds. The character of that revenge displayed itself in their conduct. They did not stain their hands in the blood of their foe. Having conquered him in the field of battle, they took a noble revenge, and showed their superiority to their enemy by extending to him the hand of friendship.

Mr. DESHA thought the sense in which the gentleman had explained his observations was different from that in which he had understood him to make them. As explained, he was satisfied with them.

Mr. FORSYTH said he did not mean what he had said as an explanation.

The amendment proposed was finally negatived by the following vote: For the motion 52, against it 81.

The question recurring on the adoption of the new section, Mr. McKEE proposed a substitute to it, nearly in the following words:

"That all volunteers who may enter the service of the United States under this act, and serve out the time stipulated, in all future calls for militia service under the authority of the United States, shall have credit for a term of service equal to the term served by them respectively."

On the question to agree to this substitute, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 95.

After a few remarks of Mr. FISK, of Vermont, in objection to this amendment, and Mr. McKEE in reply, the question was taken on agreeing to the section as amended, and carried in the affirmative without a division.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, then moved an amendment going to limit the number of volunteers to be accepted to ten thousand.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. McKEE, TROUP, and WRIGHT, and advocated by the mover.

This proposed amendment having been amended by striking out ten thousand and inserting "fifty thousand," the amendment limiting the number, as amended, was negatived—37 only rising in the affirmative.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, then moved to amend the first section of the bill, by incorporating therein, after the clause authorizing the acceptance of volunteers, the following words: "who may be organized in companies, battalions, and regiments, under the authority of any State," &c.

This motion, and that which follows, were debated at considerable length. Messrs. GHOLSON, WRIGHT, SHARP, and FISK, of New York, advocated the amendment, and Messrs. WEBSTER and GROSVENOR opposed it.

This amendment was agreed to by the following vote: For the amendment 68, against it 55.

Mr. GHOLSON then moved an amendment in the following section, which he conceived to be consequent on this; the object of which was, as the reporter understood, to authorize the Executive to receive into the service of the United States, the volunteer corps so associated and organized under State authority.

On the proposed amendment, the debate was renewed with considerable zeal. It was supported by Messrs. GHOLSON, FISK, of New York, WRIGHT, and RHEA, of Tennessee, and opposed by Messrs. WEBSTER, GROSVENOR, and MACON.

The question thereon was decided by yeas and nays: For the motion 71, against it 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Bines, Bowen, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Condit, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Evans, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lyle, McCoy, McLean, Moore, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davenport, Ely, Farrow, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hopkins, of Kentucky, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, McKee, Montgomery, Moseley, Markell, Nelson, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, John Reed, Win. Reed, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Shoffey, Sherwood, Shipford, Skinner, Smith of New York, Stanford, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Troup, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson, of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, and Yancey.

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. GHOLSON took occasion to observe, that the rejection of this amendment, though consequent upon the first, was of little importance, as every purpose he had in view was answered by that already adopted.

This Mr. GROSVENOR denied, because, he said, as the bill now stood, these volunteers, nominally under State authority, must be officered by the Executive of the United States, &c.

To this Mr. GHOLSON replied, that the words "organized under State authority," certainly embraced also the commissioning the officers by the States.

To put this question entirely out of doubt, as he said, Mr. INGERSOLL moved to insert, after the clause just recited, the words "Provided, the officers of the said volunteers shall be commissioned by the President of the United States." This motion he supported by a speech of some length, to which Mr. GHOLSON replied also at some length. Mr. RHEA made a few observations in opposition to it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose to move the postponement of the further consideration of this subject for the present. He thought it probable, when the House had acted on other measures of more importance than this, they would be better prepared to act on this subject. When the Committee on Military Affairs had determined to call up this bill before the other two they had reported, it was under the impression it would meet with little or no discussion or diversity of opinion. Disappointed in that expectation, and believing himself that the provisions of this bill were inconsistent with each other, and that those provisions were wanting that were necessary to give it efficiency, he moved to lay the bill on the table, which was agreed to.

TUESDAY, November 8.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, presented the memorial of sundry ship-owners and merchants of Baltimore, representing, that in consequence of the strict blockade of our bays and rivers, the private-armed service is much discouraged, &c., and submitting to Congress the expediency of authorizing a bounty to be given for the destruction of the enemy's vessels. They state their opinion of the high effect of this sort of warfare on the enemy's commerce, and say that they are ready to give the best pledge of their sincerity in this belief, if encouragement be afforded, by entering largely into the enterprises against the commerce of the enemy.—The memorial was read, and referred.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, reported a bill to incorporate the subscribers to a bank, by the name and style of "The Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown;" which was twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. CLOPTON, of Virginia, a committee was ordered to be appointed to wait on the President of the United States, with the joint resolution requesting him to appoint a day of fasting and prayer.

The bill for the relief of John Castille passed through a Committee of the Whole. [The case of the petitioner is nearly this, as stated by Mr. ROBERTSON: The petitioner was convicted, before the United States' Court, of having in his possession smuggled goods, and was therefor fined to the amount of fourteen or fifteen thousand dollars. From circumstances which appeared on the trial, he was recommended by the jury to the mercy of the Government. He has now been in prison eighteen months, and, unless relieved by Congress, must forever remain there. Whatever property he has or may acquire still remains liable for the fine.] The bill was ordered to a third reading.

SMALL ARMED VESSELS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described, viz: not more than twenty vessels, to carry not less than eight nor more than fourteen guns.

The bill having been read through—

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, (the Chairman of the Naval Committee,) said, the object of the bill was sufficiently explained by its contents. As to its expediency, the experience of the present war had amply demonstrated the utility of this species of force. He called upon the Committee for a moment to turn its attention to the cruises of those vessels, and compare their effects with those of the cruises of the larger vessels. The conquests achieved by our frigates, &c., would never be forgotten; they were great and important; but their depredations on the commerce of the enemy, during long cruises, had been comparatively unimportant. On reference to the cruises of private armed vessels, of the class contemplated by this bill, a very different result appeared. The effects of their enterprises against the commerce of the enemy had been great and important; such, indeed, as to give us every reason to believe that a class of small, swift-sailing vessels, of this description, would, in all probability, conduce to put a speedy end to the war, by the impression it would make on the enemy's commerce. He very much doubted whether the Government could expend a small sum of money in any way so efficiently as if appropriated to the particular purposes of this bill. He knew some of the best and most enlightened friends of the Navy were opposed to the bill; but he did not believe, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the present situation of the country, that they could assign sufficient objections to it. Our Navy had acquired a greater stock of glory, credit, and reputation, to themselves, and reflected it upon the country, than ever had been acquired in the same space of time by any military equipment, either by land or ocean, in any country. He had paid some little attention to the history of the British navy, and he believed the history of our Navy would stand a comparison with any other the world affords. But, in regard to depredation on the commerce of the enemy, he believed their efficiency could not be compared to that of vessels of a smaller class.

Mr. W. REED, of Massachusetts, rose to oppose the bill as it now stood. If he could persuade himself that the effects anticipated by the honorable Chairman of the Naval Committee could ever be realized, in the common course of events, he should be the last man in the House to oppose the passage of the bill for a moment. He thought he could make it appear that the ground assumed by the gentleman from Virginia was wholly untenable. By the force proposed in this bill, Mr. R.

said, it was not expected that any battles were to be fought with the naval force of the enemy on the ocean: we are, on the contrary, to rely on what is done, and retreat from the contest. Would the House, he asked, create a force which would compel those officers of our Navy who have already won so much glory to their country, to resort to this species of vessel? Would they oblige a Perry, a Macdonough, and other officers, to command that species of force which obliges them to take flight the moment they come in sight of the enemy? He doubted, indeed, whether, if put into gunboats, (the most contemptible of all force,) they would retreat from the enemy without first trying their strength with him. It was degrading not only to the character of the men, but of the nation, to submit such men to serve in this sort of mosquito fleet. However he might have been opposed to the war from its commencement—and nothing had occurred in its progress which changed his opinion of it—he yet entertained those feelings which actuated him, in its commencement, to endeavor to make it subservient, so far as he could, to correct principles. This would be as far accomplished by the establishment of a navy, as by anything they could do. He was warranted by facts in saying, that no force would be half as efficient, in proportion to its expense; none would be of so much service to the country; none, certainly, would touch the enemy half as much as a naval force of a proper character. What are we about to create by this bill? asked Mr. R. A species of force, which, like the cowardly and ravenous hawk, pounces on its prey; but, whilst securing it, perchance, sees some king-bird soaring round, and quits its prey to seek safety in ignoble flight. Shall we expose our officers to this mortification? He hoped not. Mr. R. then took a view of the cost and expense of this description of vessels, proposed by the bill, as compared with that of sloops of war, and also of their relative efficacy to the vessels composing the navy of the enemy, of whose vessels in commission, in number 558 at the last accounts, 990, besides the ships-of-the-line and frigates, would be superior, and only about 44 schooners, &c., inferior to it. The schooners to be authorized by the bill—upon the ground, which he assumed, that they are intended to be schooners—would be inferior in force to three-fourths of the valuable merchant ships, and superior only to such enemy's vessels as sail under convoy, for the dispersion of which they must wait before they could operate upon them. Schooners, besides, were unsafe sea-boats, liable to lose their masts and spars, which it would be difficult for them to replace. He contrasted with these vessels the class of sloops of war, not greatly more expensive, which, he said, were equal or superior to 334 of the vessels of the enemy's navy, and which no merchant vessel ever presumed to resist. For the sake of humanity, even, he therefore thought they ought to be preferred. Much reliance appeared to be placed on the fast sailing of these schooners. They did not, he said, sail faster than well-constructed, square-rigged vessels; and instanced the case of some of the most successful of our privateers, which were square-rigged, whilst those which were otherwise rigged had almost all been swept from the ocean by the enemy's cruisers. He stated, in terms supplied by his nautical experience, the reason of the superiority of square-rigged vessels. Our frigates, he said, were able to overcome any schooners that sailed the ocean. In short, he considered it a settled point, that our square-rigged vessels, built for sailing, were superior to the schooners built with the same view. Sloops of war, he said, could be equipped nearly as soon as schooners, and were more efficient, beyond all calculation. He wanted something like a naval force which should not degrade the character of the country. He appealed to the experience of our own sloops of war Argus, Peacock, &c., and said, he was not disposed to sanction that species of force which insured everything but honor, and would surrender still more of that treasure which he conceived to have been already lavishly expended. He moved to amend the bill by striking out of that clause which describes the force of the vessels, the words "not less than 8 nor more than 14 guns," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "not less than 20 nor more than 24 guns."

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, corrected the impression of Mr. REED as to "schooners," which word was not contained in the bill, but the word "vessels." Mr. I. was desirous of amending the bill so as to read "not less than eight nor more than twenty-two guns." This he said, would be doing little more than extending the discretion of the Navy Department, in the particular in which he thought it might be safely confided in; and, without subscribing to the sentiments of either of the gentlemen, he did not despair of being able to satisfy the Committee that the amendment he proposed would answer the purposes of the Government better than in its present shape. The limitation to fourteen guns, he apprehended, was inserted in the other House on the motion of a gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) for whose professional knowledge and general opinions on this subject, Mr. I. said, he had the greatest respect. But it was not the fact, he believed, that the best privateers were limited to fourteen guns; and for proof of this assertion he need only refer to the newspapers of the last week. One or two privateers which had lately come into port, after reaping a rich harvest on the ocean, carried sixteen guns. They were, however, manned by adventurous men, accustomed to man and work what are called the Baltimore schooners, and who without any disparagement to the officers of the Navy were better qualified than they for that peculiar class of vessels, Mr. I. favored the adoption of a larger class than that proposed by the bill, as better adapted to our officers, and also to the nature of the service. He referred to the cruises of our sloops of war, which had been brilliant and honorable to our country, annoying, mischievous, and discreditable to the enemy. He was therefore in favor of leaving a discretion in the Government to build or purchase vessels of different rates, from eight to twenty-two guns.

Mr. McKim, of Maryland, said he was impressed with the belief that the smaller description of vessels embraced in the bill would be more beneficial than the large class now proposed. If we take a view of the cruises of different vessels, public and private, of various sizes, it must be obvious that smaller vessels are abundantly more efficient than the larger ones. The larger vessels added to our glory, and proved our military capacity on the ocean; never had the valor, intrepidity, and nautical skill of any nation been more distinguished than those of the United States. But he was astonished to hear any gentleman assert that small vessels were not more efficient in annoying the commerce of the enemy than larger ones. It appeared to him that our naval military renown had been raised to the highest point; and, if he had the management, he would not again send out our larger vessels during the war, for there would be little chance of meeting with vessels of the enemy except in squadron. Our object is now to attack the enemy where he is most vulnerable, in his commerce; for that purpose, he was decidedly of opinion the smaller class of vessels was the best, and the expense of them not more than thirty or thirty-five thousand dollars each. Britain now enjoyed almost the whole carrying trade of the world. It is in our power, in a great degree, to deprive her of the advantages of it, and he hoped we should avail ourselves of the opportunity.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, adverted to the cruise of the Mammoth privateer, noticed in this morning's paper, and read it as an argument in favor of the bill. As to the rigging, it was not prescribed in the bill but left, as it should be, to the discretion of the Head of the Department. As to the discredit of running from an enemy, Mr. W. asked if any honor was lost if by accident our naval officers in these vessels should fall into the hands of an enemy treble or ten times its force, or if they made every exertion to escape capture by superior force? He contended not. The cruise of the Mammoth proves the efficacy of these vessels; she captured and destroyed twenty-one vessels, saw many cruisers, but escaped from them all, anything in the remarks of the gentleman to the contrary notwithstanding. When France had been obliged to shut up her ships-of-the-line in port, she had greatly annoyed the British commerce by her small cruisers. Let gentlemen turn their eyes to the accounts of the dissatisfaction at Lloyd's, and they will find the enterprise of our privateers and small national armed vessels has greatly vexed the British merchants. We can fit out three or four of these for the cost of one sloop of war; even the smallest class were equal to cope with any merchantman; and they were not expected to catch frigates. They had been compared to hawks. Making use of this comparison, he said he had never heard of a hawk catching an eagle, though eagles frequently caught hawks. For, he said, these small vessels were not expected to encounter frigates or sloops of war. He compared them to the skirmishers of an army, who fight till out-numbered, and then retreat to the main body. Our large vessels could not get in or out, whilst these flyers would defy the cruisers of the enemy to blockade them. A privateer of eight guns, he said, was able to take a merchant ship of forty guns and only half the number of men. He made some allusion to the use of liquid fire, to be used at sea and spouted on the enemy. Gentlemen might laugh at this idea, he said, but he had no doubt, if it were made the interest of the region from which the gentleman from Massachusetts comes, the people in that quarter would find the means of applying this invention, which had received the warm approbation of some men well skilled in nautical war. If these vessels carried too many guns, it would impede their sailing. This description of vessels (Baltimore flyers) required to be trimmed and navigated in a particular way; and he did not know, if the enemy got possession of one of them, but they would upset it from ignorance of the manner of sailing it. It would be folly of an extraordinary kind, Mr. W. said, to send our frigates out for the purpose of fighting alone against so superior a force as they must encounter; for even the French, with their great navy, had been obliged to lay it up when at war with England, or else to send out squadrons by stealth. As to these schooners, Mr. W. said, they could not be caught; you might as well attempt to catch a bird. They can sail nearer the wind than square rigged vessels, &c. He knew enough of navigation to know that they could, in that way, out-sail square rigged vessels, &c. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman from Massachusetts would sanction this bill as it stood, anything in his opposition to the war to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LOWNDES said he should vote against this amendment, in expectation that the amendment suggested by Mr. INGERSOLL would be accepted. He was in favor of vesting a discretion in the Executive as to the precise rate of these vessels. Listening attentively to the arguments, he could see no ground on which to believe that the House were more competent to decide the question as to the proper rate of these vessels, and the proper number of guns or masts they should carry, than the Secretary of the Navy, to whom therefore he was disposed to consign this question. In respect to one point, the capacity of schooners to out-sail square rigged vessels, he could say the gentleman from Maryland was mistaken. He was informed by a naval officer, than whom there was none in whom more confidence might be reposed, (Captain Perry,) that he had never known an instance in which a brig of the United States had failed to overtake a schooner. The brigs of the enemy might not be able to overtake our schooners; but this difference arose from the superiority of our seamanship. Without assigning the reasons which satisfied his mind of the expediency of a larger class of vessels, he said he should vote against this amendment, with a view to vote for one which should leave a wider discretion with the Executive.

The question was then taken on Mr. REED's motion to amend the bill, and negatived—ayes only 40.

Mr. INGERSOLL then moved to amend the bill by striking out 14, the maximum, and inserting 22 guns, so as that the rate of the vessels shall not fall short of 8 nor exceed 22 guns.

This motion Mr. I. supported by a speech, in which he expressed his decided preference for the larger class of vessels. He reviewed the cruises of our frigates, pronouncing the capture of the Guerriere by the Constitution as having been more important, in its moral effect, than all the cruises of all our privateers put together; and certainly the most efficient cruise of any vessel, great or small, had been that of the Essex. If these vessels were intended merely to act as privateers, they had nothing to do but to take off the double duties on prize goods, and they would have no occasion to employ public vessels on that service.

Mr. PLEASANTS spoke in explanation. He had no objection to the amendment now proposed, going to extend the Executive discretion, but that it would interfere with the bill as it had been arranged with some care in the Senate, and passed that body. The idea of disgrace attaching to vessels from running from superior force, was more romantic than real. On what principles ought naval commanders, or even military commanders, to act? Every wise general, every prudent sea captain, will get out of the way of a force too heavy for him; a ship flies a frigate, a frigate a seventy-four, &c. This objection, he thought, had as little weight as any other which had been urged.

The question on the amendment proposed by Mr. INGERSOLL, was decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

Mr. WILLIAM REED then moved to amend the bill so as to put it in execution, "as soon as measures are taken to equip for sea such of the larger vessels directed to be built by former laws, as are in such a state of forwardness as that they may be equipped during the ensuing winter."

This motion he supported by a speech of considerable length, in which he expressed a want of confidence in the head of the Navy Department, which prevented him from relying implicitly on him for the faithful execution of this trust, unless he were bound to it by a special provision like this. He adverted to the state of these vessels; the inactivity of preparation. Why they were left defenceless, and obliged to rely on the indulgence or generosity of the States for the cannon to protect them, he could not say, but he should be glad to know. He made a number of other remarks in this strain, and to show the advantages the United States would derive from sending these vessels out this Winter, which was not yet too late to be accomplished by a zealous, faithful, and active officer, &c. Though no friend to the war, he was disposed by active exertions to bring it to as speedy a close as possible, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. PLEASANTS very decidedly opposed this motion, on the ground of the very unnecessary delay it would occasion to the execution of this bill, which ought to be carried into effect promptly, if at all. The two objects did not conflict, nor were they connected; and the amendment was therefore injudicious. The Government had, no doubt, made every exertion to get these vessels ready, compatible with other engagements, and the urgency of the case, &c.

This motion was negatived—ayes only 25.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House, who agreed to the amendment which had been made to it.

Mr. WILLIAM REED then moved to strike out eight, the minimum of force, and insert "eighteen;" which motion was negatived by yeas and nays—yeas 43, nays 98.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, November 9.

Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, presented a memorial of seven hundred and twenty-nine persons, praying, for reasons therein stated, that certain public lands may be appropriated and sold at twelve and a half cents the acre to actual settlers. On the question to refer the same to the Committee on Public Lands, there were for the motion 48, against it 50. So the House refused to refer the said memorial, which falls on the table of course.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, from the District Committee, reported a bill to incorporate the subscribers to a bank in Alexandria, by the name and style of the Union Bank of Alexandria; which bill was twice read, and committed.

The bill for the relief of John Castille, of the city of New Orleans, was read a third time.

The bill from the Senate "authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described," as amended in this House, was read a third time, and passed, without opposition.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the Secretary of State to make an additional allowance, during the present war, to masters of vessels for bringing home destitute and distressed American seamen to the United States.

Mr. EPPES quoted the letters received from the Secretary of State at the last session recommending the passage of the bill; from which it appears that no larger appropriation is asked for than that annually made, but the appropriation of a gross sum of the same amount is recommended, and also the repeal of the limitation now provided of ten dollars for each seaman so brought into the United States.

The Committee reported the bill without amendment, and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The bill directing the staff officers of the Army to comply with the requisitions of the naval and marine officers in certain cases, having been called over, was, on motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, postponed until to-morrow week.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and sustaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors."

The bill contains twenty-seven sections, all of mere detail, conformable to the resolutions which have passed the House, except the following:

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That towards establishing an adequate revenue to provide for the payment of the expenses of Government, for the punctual payment of the public debt, principal and interest, contracted and to be contracted, according to the terms of the contracts respectively; and for creating an adequate sinking fund gradually to reduce, and eventually to extinguish the public debt, contracted, and to be contracted; the rates and duties laid and imposed by this act, and the duties laid and imposed upon licenses to distillers, in and by the said act, entitled "An act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," shall continue to be laid, levied, and collected during the present war between us and Great Britain, and until the purposes aforesaid shall be completely accomplished, anything in the said act of Congress to the contrary thereof, in any wise, notwithstanding. And for the effectual application of the revenue to be raised by and from the said duties to the purposes aforesaid, in due form of law, the faith of the United States is hereby pledged: Provided always, That whenever Congress shall deem it expedient, to alter, reduce, or change the said duties or either of them, it shall be lawful so to do, upon providing and substituting by law, at the same time, and for the same purposes, other duties which shall be equally productive with the duties so altered, reduced, or changed: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed in anywise to rescind or impair any specific appropriation of the said duties or either of them; but such appropriation shall remain and be carried into effect according to the true intent and meaning of the law and laws making the same, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to anticipate the collection and receipt of the duties laid and imposed by this act, and by the said act, entitled "An act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," by obtaining a loan, upon the pledge of the said duties for the reimbursement thereof, to an amount not exceeding six millions of dollars, and at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum per annum. And any bank or banks now incorporated, or which may hereafter be incorporated, under the authority of the United States, is, and are, hereby authorized to make such loan: Provided always, and it is expressly declared, That the money so obtained upon loan, shall be applied to the purposes aforesaid, to which the said duties so to be pledged are by this act applied and appropriated, and to no other purposes whatsoever.

The bill was committed.—And on motion, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, November 10.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate do not concur in the amendment proposed by this House to the bill "to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described."

A motion was then made by Mr. PLEASANTS, that this House do recede from their amendment to the bill, disagreed to by the Senate as aforesaid. And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do insist on the said amendment, and ask a conference upon the subject-matter thereof.

Mr. PLEASANTS, Mr. WILLIAM REED, and Mr. INGERSOLL, were appointed the managers at the said conference on the part of the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate adhere to their disagreement to the amendments of this House to the bill "to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described," and agree to the conference asked upon the subject-matter thereof, and have appointed managers on their part.

The bill to authorize the Secretary of State, during the present war, to make an additional allowance to masters of vessels for bringing home destitute and distressed American seamen, was read a third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of John Chalmers, jr. The bill was discussed, and its object explained by the Chairman of the Committee of Claims (Mr. YANCEY) and by the reading of the report of the Committee, and then reported to the House.

After the bill was reported to the House, some discussion took place on the point, whether Mr. Chalmers did or did not receive timely notice of the intention to burn the building containing the yarn, &c., which was destroyed. The bill was eventually ordered to lie on the table, on motion of Mr. EPPES of Virginia.

On motion of Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, the petition which he presented yesterday, praying for the exposure of the public lands for sale at twelve and a half cents per acre to actual settlers, was taken up and referred.

ARMY SUPPLIES AND DISCIPLINE.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, offered for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of changing the present mode of supplying the Army by contracts, or some other better calculated for a state of war, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House whether the Army of the United States is trained by any one uniform system of discipline; and, if not, what are the causes which have prevented it.

Mr. CALHOUN said, it was not necessary to state to the House, that next to having an army, to have it well supplied and well trained was an object of the greatest importance. He had been informed, from a source to be relied on, that the present mode of supplying the Army, whilst it subjected the public to speculations by the contractors, was frequently on great emergencies found wholly inefficient. One of the most important enterprises in the South would have failed in consequence of the deficiency of the contractor, had not the difficulty been overcome by the great energy of the Commanding General on that occasion. There was, he had also understood, a variance in the discipline of the Army, in consequence of five or six different systems employed in training of the Army. So great was this variance, that no large body of our Army, Brown's command perhaps excepted, could be properly exercised together.

The resolutions were agreed to

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. EPES, by general consent, made a report from the Committee of Ways and Means, on the amendment proposed by the Senate to the three million loan bill. [This amendment proposes to pledge, to pay the interest and gradually redeem the principal of this particular loan, a portion of the internal duties now existing, or to be hereafter imposed.] The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. EPES, of Virginia said, the Committee of Ways and Means had had under consideration the propriety of a general increase of the Sinking Fund. They considered it proper that any measure of this kind ought to apply to all the new stock, and not to a small portion of it. On this subject they had addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting him to state those particulars of information which were necessary to enable the Committee to take up the whole subject, and place the new debt of the United States upon the same firm and solid basis that the old debt had previously been placed on. If the House were of opinion that it would be better to apply this principle to a fragment of the debt, than to make the general provision he had suggested, they would vote for the amendment of the Senate. If, however, it was their opinion that every public creditor ought to receive the same measure of justice, and that no line of discrimination ought to be drawn between them, the rule ought to be extended to all the new debt, if to any. The Committee had on these grounds determined to recommend a disagreement to the Senate's amendment. On this view of the subject, when the House reflected that they had already given the most substantial pledges to impose sufficient taxes; when a bill had been reported containing a provision for creating an adequate Sinking Fund, and paying the interest of the debt, and thus reviving the public credit, he hoped the House would think with him, that it would be more correct to take that course than to adopt the amendment of the Senate.

The question to disagree to the amendment of the Senate, was decided in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, November 11.

Another member, to wit: from New York, ISAAC WILLIAMS, jr., appeared and took his seat.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Alexandria, praying that their charter may be so amended as that they may be authorized to issue notes for any sum not less than one dollar.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Augusta, Rockingham, and Shenandoah, in the State of Virginia, who profess themselves to be of that class of citizens called ancient German Baptists, Tunkards, and Menonists; and are conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms, praying to be protected in the full enjoyment of their religious liberties, and liberty of conscience, according to the faith.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize the Commissioner of the Revenue to cause a clerk in his office to aid him in signing licenses; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Mr. EPES also reported a bill to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by duties on sales at auction; on the postage of letters; on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise; on carriages for the conveyance of persons; and on plated harness; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. JENNINGS, from the committee appointed on the 4th instant, reported a bill to authorize the publication of the laws of the United States within the Territories of the United States; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill to authorize the Commissioner of the Revenue to cause a clerk in his office to aid him in signing licenses was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. CONDIOT,

Resolved, That the report and documents submitted to the House, on the 9th of April last, by the committee appointed to inquire into the manner of making contracts for supplying the Army of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures, with instructions to inquire in what particular instances, if any, the public moneys advanced to quartermasters and army contractors have been misapplied; what losses, if any, are likely to be sustained, and what measures, if any, are taken for their recovery; and that said committee be further instructed to inquire and report to this House, in what particular instances, if any, the supplies of provisions and other necessities, furnished by the contractors for the use of the militia, when in service, have been found to be either deficient in quantity or unfit for use, together with such amendments as the laws on these subjects may, in their opinion, require.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the War Department, stating, that few or no material papers were lost, during the late incursion of the enemy.

A message was received from the Senate insisting on their amendment to the three million loan bill, and inviting a conference. On motion of Mr. EPPES, the House insisted on their disagreement, and accepted the invitation of the Senate to a conference.

The House, on motion of Mr. YANCEY of North Carolina, resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of John Chalmers, jr. Further evidence in support of his claim was produced and read.

The motion depending on the former discussion of the bill, was to recommit the bill to the Committee of Claims.

The questions now presented by it were these: 1. Whether this was a class of cases, which, if clearly established, was entitled to the favorable attention of Congress? 2. Whether, if it was such a case, it would be proper to act singly on this case, without reference to others of a similar character? 3. Whether the statement of facts was supported by the evidence? On the two first of these points, the opinion appeared to be generally favorable to the claimant, considering his case entirely sui generis. On the last point, there was a difference of opinion, on the ground that the House had not before it as conclusive evidence on the subject as was within their reach.

In the end, however, the motion to recommit the bill was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FISK, of New York, called up the National Bank bill; but, on suggestion of Mr. GASTON of North Carolina that time had not been allowed since it was reported for the due consideration of its provisions, waived his motion, and gave notice that he should call it up on Monday.

The order of the day on the bill making further provision "for filling the ranks of the regular Army by classifying the free male population of the United States;" having been called over—

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, moved that the further consideration of this order of the day be postponed until Tuesday next. In support of this motion, he urged the impropriety of the two branches of the Legislature acting at the same time on two bills, with totally distinct provisions, having the same object in view. If both should pass, the interchange of the bills would place each House in an awkward predicament. In any view, no time could be saved by acting on this bill, pending the discussion of another bill on the same subject in the other branch of the Legislature.

The question on postponement was carried in the affirmative without a division.

PETITION OF WILLIAM ARNOLD.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of William Arnold; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next. The report is as follows:

That the petitioner states that he was possessed of a loan office certificate, issued from the loan office in Massachusetts, payable to Christopher Clark, or bearer, for $600; and dated the 25th October, 1777. That on the 27th December, 1787, his house was burnt, and, with it, this certificate, &c. He prays that another certificate of like value may be issued to him.

From the papers submitted to the committee, it appears that the house of the petitioner was destroyed by fire, as stated in the petition; that the said certificate had been in the possession of the petitioner; that the fact of its destruction was made known to two witnesses soon after it happened; and that notice of said destruction was given in one of the public papers of Boston, and also in the Newport Herald. These advertisements were not inserted, however until October, 1790, nearly three years after the destruction.

In December, 1790, the petitioner notified the commissioner of loans at Boston of the fact, and deposited with him the evidence thereof. That in November, 1791, he petitioned Congress on the subject, which was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, who made his report in April, 1792. This report was referred to the committee who reported thereon, but the report was not further acted on.

From the above facts it appears that the petitioner has complied with the requisites of the resolve of Congress of the 10th of May, 1780, in every particular except as to the time in which notice should have been given of the destruction.

It also appears, by a letter received from the Auditor of the Treasury, that this claim was presented, and registered in his office on the 29th of May, 1795, which is within the time prescribed by the act of the 21st April, 1794; and that the reason why it was not recognised and settled was, that the advertisement of the destruction of the certificate was too late to entitle the claimant to relief.

From the foregoing facts, the committee feel satisfied that the claim is a just one; and they find no legal objection to its being allowed, except that the provision of the resolve of 1780, relative to the notice of the destruction of the certificate has not been complied with. They do not think this objection sufficient to bar the claim. It may not be proper, on slight occasions, to forego the provisions of a law founded in wisdom, and thereby give precedents to sanction claims supported neither by law nor equity; but when to obtain justice it is necessary to do so, the committee feel not only willing, but bound to do it. They, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Auditor's Office, October 28, 1814.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 27th instant, I have the honor to state, that the claim of William Arnold for the renewal of a loan office certificate of the nominal value of six hundred dollars, under the act of the 21st April, 1794, was presented and registered at this office, on the 29th May, 1795; and that the papers in relation thereto (believed to be the same now offered in support of his petition) remained in my possession until the 5th of March, 1814, when they were withdrawn by Mr. Potter of the House of Representatives. The objection to the admission of this claim at the Treasury, as noted on a general statement furnished the chairman of the Committee of Claims, on the 8th of March, 1802, were in the following words: "The destruction appears to have taken place on the 27th December, 1787, but was not advertised until the month of October, 1790, which was too late to entitle the claimant to the benefit of the act." The petition and documents are herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient humble servant,

R. HARRISON.

Hon. JOHN C. CHAPPELL,
Chairman of Committee on Pensions, &c.

PAY OF THE TROOPS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that any kind of money which may be paid by the Government to the troops in the service of the United States, for military services, shall be receivable in payment from the people for their taxes.

Mr. H. said that the propriety of offering the resolution had suggested itself to his mind from the circumstance of the Tennessee troops having been paid for their services in the Creek war, with Chilicothe notes. It was true, he said, that some of the notes were made payable in Baltimore and Philadelphia, but many of them were payable at the Chilicothe Bank, in Ohio. These notes, he said, would not pass in Tennessee, without a discount of from ten to twenty-five per cent. and that the tax gatherers were not authorized to receive them in the payment of taxes. Mr. H. said that a provision like the one contemplated by the resolution, would prevent the paymasters from speculating upon the people. That it was now in the power of the paymasters to make arrangements so as to pay troops off with notes on the most distant and inconvenient banks, and afterwards to have them purchased up at a considerable discount. It was a fact, he said, that the Chilicothe notes would not be taken from the people in Tennessee, even by the merchants, without a discount of at least ten per cent. He said that the Tennessee troops who fought last Winter the Creek war, and returned covered with scars, received for their services these notes, which are not allowed to be taken in the payment of their taxes. For this evil he hoped the Committee of Ways and Means would be able to provide a remedy.

The motion was agreed to.

SMALL ARMED VESSELS.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses relative to the bill authorizing the purchase or building of not more than twenty small armed vessels, made a report recommending the House to strike out the words "twenty-two" guns and insert "sixteen;" so as that the vessels to be built or purchased shall carry not less than eight nor more than sixteen guns.

Mr. P. stated, that on recurring to the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, recommending the authorization of those vessels, it appeared that they were intended to be schooners. It was pretty well understood that sixteen was the largest number of guns which the largest class of schooner ers carries. The vessels embraced by the bill were considered by the Naval Committee merely in the light of a temporary acquisition, not as a permanent addition to the Navy. Vessels of this description could be very readily obtained, prepared with great facility and sent to sea with expedition, (which was a great object,) and when there was no longer occasion for them, could be disposed of at their full value. All these considerations, combined, urged the adoption of the modification proposed by the committee.

Mr. W. REED, of Massachusetts not desiring to repeat arguments he had heretofore urged on this subject, said he rose only to remind the House of the abortion of former attempts to procure by purchase a temporary naval force. As to the disposal of them at the end of the war, Mr. R. said most probably the enemy would take care of them all before the end of the Winter.

The report of the committee of conference was then agreed to.

SATURDAY, November 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, "making further provision for filling the ranks of the Army of the United States;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to whom is committed the bill making further provision for filling the ranks of the regular Army, by classifying the free male population of the United States.

An engrossed bill to authorize the publication of the Laws of the United States within the Territories of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Chalmers, jun., was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, the Committee of Ways and Means were directed to inquire into the expediency of imposing a duty on all goods and merchandise imported into the United States, that, under the existing laws, may be admitted to entry free of duty.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill giving the right of pre-emption on the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Indiana Territory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPES, of Virginia, made the following report from the committee of conference:

"The managers on the part of the Senate, and on the part of the House of Representatives, at the conference on the amendments of the Senate, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill entitled 'An act to authorize a loan for a sum not exceeding three millions of dollars,' report, that the Senate do recede from their amendments to the said bill, except so much thereof as strikes out the last clause of the 5th section, and do agree, as a substitute therefor, to the two following sections, &c.

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the annual sum of eight millions of dollars heretofore appropriated to the Sinking Fund, adequate and permanent funds shall, during the present session of Congress, be provided and appropriated for the payment of the interest, and reimbursement of the principal of said stock created by this act.

"Sec. 7, And be it further enacted, That an adequate and permanent sinking fund, gradually to reduce, and eventually to extinguish the public debt, contracted and to be contracted during the present war, shall also be established during the present session of Congress."

The report having been read, it was, on motion of Mr. EPPES, ordered to lie on the table, until the bill should be returned from the Senate. It was subsequently taken up, and the report agreed to.

TREASURY NOTES.

The following resolutions were submitted for consideration by Mr. HALL.

1. Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue notes convenient for circulation, to the amount of — millions of dollars, under such checks as may be thought best calculated to detect counterfeits, in which alone, and gold and silver, shall all taxes, duties, imposts, or debts due, or which hereafter become due to the United States, be paid.

2. Resolved, That the Treasury notes which may be issued as aforesaid, shall be a legal tender in all debts due, or which may hereafter become due, between the citizens of the United States, or between a citizen of the United States and a citizen or subject of any foreign State or Kingdom.

3. Resolved, That the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, shall cause to be purchased, in each State and Territory, and in each collection district thereof, as nearly as circumstances will permit, supplies for the Army and Navy of the United States, to the amount of taxes to be collected in each State, Territory, and collection district.

4. Resolved, That any individual, or body corporate or politic, at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the Treasury notes, by them held, and annually thereafter at their option, may fund the same, and receive in lieu thereof six per cent. stock.

5. Resolved, That, after paying the annual amount of principal and interest of the existing public debt, and the interest which may accrue on the stock created, by funding the Treasury notes to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, the whole amount of taxes, duties, imposts, and sales of public lands, shall be pledged for the redemption of the notes which may remain in circulation.

Upon each of these resolutions Mr. H. made a number of remarks. He said they embraced, together, a system, he verily believed was the only one which would relieve the United States from their present difficulty, and support the public credit in future. The want of a circulating medium was generally felt; and, indeed, without it, the people in the interior would be unable to pay their taxes, deprived as they were of a market for their surplus produce. Bank paper of one section of the country was in a state of depreciation in another; and unless some medium of general credit was immediately established, incalculable evils would result, &c.

The question on consideration of these resolves was taken separately, at the instance of Mr. OAKLEY.

The House agreed to consider the 1st, 3d, 4th, and 5th, but refused to consider the 2d, by the following vote, as taken by yeas and nays—for considering it 42, against it 95, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Burwell, Butler, Cannon, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Earle, Forney, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hubbard, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Macon, McCoy, Parker, Pickens, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Robertson, Shipherd, Stanford, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clopton, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davenport, Duvall, Ely, Fisk of Vermont, Forsyth, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Humphreys, Hungerford, Halbert, Ingersoll, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lewis, Lowndes, Lyle, Markell, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moore, Mosseley, Newton, Oakley, Ormsby, Pearson, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ruggles, Sevier, Soybert, Sharp, Sheffey, Sherwood, Skinner, Smith of New York, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wright, and Yancey.

The question having been stated on agreeing to the other resolutions—

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, said, that, in the absence of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, he should assign reasons, which he hoped would appear satisfactory, for the motion he was about to make. The resolutions, so far as they were directory to the committee, enjoined on it no other duties than it had already performed. To establish a circulating medium, the Committee of Ways and Means had proposed, in their report, at an early day in the session, to issue Treasury notes, in many respects resembling the species of paper embraced in the motion of the gentleman from Georgia. Soon after the committee made this report, a correspondence had been opened through the chairman, between the committee and the new Secretary of the Treasury, which correspondence had been already laid before the House. The Secretary of the Treasury, believing that the emission of Treasury notes could only be made with advantage to a certain extent, had thought proper to suggest a proposition for supplying a circulating medium of general confidence, by establishing a National Bank. After receiving and reporting this correspondence, the Committee of Ways and Means had thought proper to report, in general terms, a resolution that it is expedient to establish a National Bank; which resolution had received the sanction of the House. A plan, in pursuance of that resolution, had been reported, and was now in possession of the House. The House were then in possession of two projects; the one first reported, for issuing Treasury notes, and that now reported for the establishment of a bank. The object of the resolutions now before the House, was to direct the committee to make an inquiry already made, and its result reported to the House. Treasury notes must be the alternative, if a National Bank be not established; and when the House should so decide, the committee would have pleasure in carrying the wishes of the House into effect. In the meantime, Mr. G. moved that these resolves should lie on the table.

Mr. HALL said, he was well aware of the first report made by the Committee of Ways and Means, and also of the second, which had been adopted by the House. This was the only reason which induced him to bring forward those resolutions; because he believed the system recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means to be totally inadequate to the occasion. It was proposed to establish a bank of fifty millions of dollars, with only six millions of specie. To him this appeared one of the most extraordinary propositions ever laid before a public body. It was time to lay aside these visionary projects, and come to a direct question on some practicable system. Establish your bank, said Mr. H., and what will be the consequence? It will be established at last only on the credit of the Government, because forty-four out of fifty millions of the capital are to be paid in stock. If the bills of the bank circulate, it will be on the credit of the Government, and not on the credit of the capital. As to the bank coming in aid of the Government, would gentlemen say that it could give aid to the Government? Could it lend the Government thirty millions of dollars? If it did, and the Northern and Eastern capitalists continue opposed to your measures, they will have it in their power within twelve months to arrest the operations of the bank, by accumulating in their hands its notes, which must circulate principally in the North and East. Such a system, therefore, he considered as improper, impolitic, and one of the most ruinous measures which could be adopted by the Government. Mr. H. was also averse to postponement, because he considered this the most important subject that could possibly be brought before the House; because, on its adoption depended entirely the future credit of the Government. The measures heretofore adopted by the Government in respect to the public revenue and credit, had, Mr. H. said, been the best calculated to defeat their object. The time was come when the nation ought to depend on its own means, and resort no more to theoretic expedients. He was sorry the House had refused to consider the second resolution, which he considered very material; but he hoped they would adopt the others.

The question on laying the resolutions on the table, was then decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

After the reading of the bill through, to give it preference in the orders of the day, the Committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, November 14.

BENJAMIN STEPHENSON, returned to serve as a Delegate for the Territory of Illinois, in the place of Shadrack Bond, resigned, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported on the petition of Joel Strawn, James Robey, George Cooper, Benjamin Smith, sundry inhabitants of Cincinnati who served in the army of General Hull; William Gates, and Thomas Reed, Elijah Browning, and Charles Gilkey, Thomas Weathers, Thomas Pace, Mary Deibler, and Asahel Schovil; as also, on a resolution of the 28th of September last, by a bill to authorize the payment of property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to authorize a donation in land to persons in the military and naval service of the enemy, who shall come within the limits of the United States, and claim the protection of the Government of the United States; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

On motion of Mr. DESHA, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the horses to be paid for that were lost by the mounted volunteers who served under Governor Shelby, in the expedition into Canada last Fall.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the following rule be added to the rules and orders of this House:

When a bill is taken up for consideration, either in the House or in Committee of the Whole House, the House, or the Committee of the Whole House, shall continue in session until the bill is gone through.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. PITKIN; which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement of the amount of the public debt on the first day of October, 1811, distinguishing the several kinds of debt, as well as that contracted before and since the present war, together with the amount owned by foreigners; containing also the amount at that time owned by States, corporations, and individuals, and the amount at the Treasury, and in the loan offices in the several States.

H. of R.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then resolved into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

The first section of the bill having been read, in the following words:

Be it enacted, &c., That a Bank of the United States shall be established, the capital stock of which shall be fifty millions of dollars, and no more, divided into one hundred thousand shares, of five hundred dollars each share, and that subscriptions towards constituting the said capital stock shall be opened on the first Monday of — next, at the following places, viz: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, Charleston, and Pittsburg, under the superintendence of the following persons, as commissioners to receive the same: at Boston, James Lloyd, Thomas Perkins, and William Gray; at New York, General John Smith, Isaac Bronson, Theron Rudd; at Philadelphia, Thomas M. Willing, Stephen Girard, Chandler Price; at Baltimore, Henry Payson, William Cooke, William Wilson; at Richmond, Benjamin Hatcher, John Brockenborough, William Preston; at Charleston, John C. Faber, John Potter, James Carson; at Pittsburg, George Robinson, Samuel Robert, and Henry Baldwin; which subscriptions shall continue open every day from the time of opening the same, from ten o'clock in the forenoon until four o'clock in the afternoon, until the Saturday following, at four o'clock in the afternoon, when the same shall be closed; and immediately thereafter, the commissioners, or any two of them, at the respective places aforesaid, shall cause two transcripts or fair copies of such subscriptions to be made, one of which they shall send to the Secretary of the Treasury, one they shall retain, and the original subscriptions shall, within three days from the closing of the same, be by the said commissioners transmitted to the said commissioners at Philadelphia, or to one of them; and, on the receipt thereof, the said commissioners at Philadelphia, or any two of them, shall immediately thereafter convene, and proceed to take an account of the said subscriptions, and if more than the amount of the said capital stock of thirty millions of dollars shall have been subscribed, then the said last mentioned commissioners shall apportion the same among the several subscribers in a just and equal ratio, according to their several and respective subscriptions: Provided, however, That such commissioners shall, by such apportionment, allow and apportion to each subscriber at least one share; and in case the aggregate amount of the said subscriptions shall exceed thirty millions of dollars, the said commissioners, after having apportioned the same as aforesaid, shall cause lists of the apportioned subscriptions to be made out, including in each list the apportioned subscription for the place where the original subscription was made, one of which lists shall be transmitted to the commissioners, or to one of the commissioners, under whose superintendence such subscriptions were originally made, that the subscribers may ascertain from them the number of shares apportioned to such subscribers respectively.

Mr. FISK, of New York, stated the reasons which had influenced the Committee of Ways and Means in confining to a few cities and towns the books of subscription, which were, generally, that the Atlantic cities were the principal repositories of specie and superfluous wealth, and that the exigencies of the times required greater expedition than was consistent with a more diffused subscription. It had been deemed proper, however, to add more commissioners in two or three of the cities; and he was instructed to move accordingly. And, on motion of Mr. F., the following gentlemen were added: to the commission at Boston, William Eastis and Samuel Brown; to the commission at New York, Isaac Lawrence and John Hone; to the commission at Philadelphia, Jared Ingersoll and Anthony Taylor.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, then said, he was not satisfied, by the reasons of the gentleman, for limiting to so few the places of subscription, and moved, for the convenience of the Western country, to insert Lexington, in Kentucky.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, proposed, also, New Orleans, and argued with much force in support of his suggestion; and other gentlemen proposed other places.

The motion of Mr. SHARP being the one immediately before the House, gave rise to considerable debate. The motion was supported by Messrs. SHARP, ROBERTSON, LEWIS, MACON, WRIGHT, PEARSON, HARRIS, HOPKINS of Kentucky, BURWELL, and BARNETT, and opposed by Messrs. FISK of New York, OAKLEY, CREIGHTON, and INGHAM.

On the one hand, various arguments were urged in favor of extending the subscription, founded on the equal rights of all sections of the country to participate in any general benefit; the expediency of collecting specie from every part of the country; the advantages of uniting in the subscription people of every quarter of the country, and thus uniting the people of all sections to the Union by the ties of interest, which are frequently stronger than those of legal or moral force. On the other hand it was said, besides the delay inseparable from such a course, that it was important that the bank should be put into operation speedily, if at all, and that its commencement would be greatly delayed by multiplying places of subscription. It was also said, that if this motion were withdrawn, an amendment might be devised by the Committee of Ways and Means, which would meet the views of all parties.

Mr. SHARP's motion at length prevailed. Lexington, Kentucky, was inserted, as one of the places at which subscriptions should be opened, and Messrs. Charles Wilkins, Lewis Sanders, and John H. Morton, designated as the commissioners.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, New Orleans was then added, and commissioners named for that place.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, Nashville was added, and Robert Weakley, Felix Grundy, and John R. Bedford, named as the commissioners.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, Washington City was added, and Robert Brent, Walter Smith, and Thomas Swann, named as commissioners. [Mr. FISK, of New York, named John Mason, Daniel

Carroll, and John P. Van Ness; but Mr. LEWIS's motion being the first made was agreed to.]

On motion of Mr. MACON, Raleigh, in North Carolina, was inserted, and Sherwood Haywood, Beverly Daniel, and William Peace, named as commissioners.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, Savannah, in Georgia, was added, and John Bolton, Charles Harris, and James Johnson, named as commissioners.

On motion of Mr. CONDUCT, New Brunswick, in New Jersey, was added, and James Vanderpool, John Gray, and Peter Gordon, named as commissioners.

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to add Utica, in New York, and John C. Devereaux, Benjamin Walker, and Jeremiah Van Rensselaer, as commissioners; but the motion was negatived, after some objections by Mr. INGHAM, and replication by Mr. GROSVENOR.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, was added, and John Goddard, Nathaniel A. Haven, and Nathaniel Gilman, named as commissioners.

On motion of Mr. KILBOURN, Pittsburg was stricken out, Chillicothe, in Ohio, added, and Samuel Findley, Thomas James, and William McFarland, named as commissioners.

Mr. LEWIS then made a motion, the object of which was to establish the principal bank at the City of Washington, in this District.

This motion was opposed by Mr. FISK, of New York, who said that the Committee of Ways and Means had fixed on Philadelphia, in preference to New York and other places, to be the seat of the principal bank, as being a place of greater security and greater wealth, and as being more central to the commercial transactions and wealth of the country, &c.

Mr. LEWIS said, he had no doubt that the gentleman from New York preferred Philadelphia to this place, as he had already given sufficient evidence of his candor in that respect. The Military School, the National Bank, and every institution of a national character, had been contemplated to be fixed at this place by those who located the Seat of Government here, &c., and so they ought to be, &c. Besides, there might be many gentlemen who would vote for a bank to be established at this place, who would, on Constitutional grounds, be opposed to its establishment elsewhere. He, therefore, hoped his motion would be agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS's motion was negatived, about fifty members only rising in favor of it.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, an amendment was adopted, authorizing the Philadelphia commissioners, in case thirty millions should not be subscribed and returned to them within the time allowed, to open the books at Philadelphia until the whole should be subscribed.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, then said, before the Committee proceeded further in the bill, he wished to propose a material amendment to it, and with a view to ascertain whether the House were disposed to hear him in support of his motion at that late hour of the day, he moved that the Committee now rise. This motion was negatived.

Mr. GASTON proceeded, in a speech of considerable ability, and more than an hour in length, to lay before the Committee his views in relation to this bill. He professed himself anxious for the establishment of a National Bank, which he had always favored when opportunity offered. But it was his decided conviction, he said, that a bill like that on the table would not answer the purposes of the nation or of the Government. This view of the subject he supported by various objections to different features of the bill, and particularly to the mode of subscription in stock of the United States; the operation of all which he contended would be to throw into circulation a quantity of paper, founded not on a specie capital, but on the credit of the United States stock, &c., which would therefore be of no greater value than any other paper which the United States should make receivable in taxes, though much more expensive to the United States than Treasury notes or bills of credit would be, &c. In support of this idea, Mr. G. adduced many illustrations, from writers on this subject, from our own history, and from analogy. He objected also to the proposed appointment of a part of the directors by the President, to the large portion of the stock to be held by the United States, &c. He wound up his argument on these and other points by observing, that as he was friendly in principle to the establishment of a National Bank, he should not consider himself as doing his duty, if, while he disapproved of this plan, he did not offer another as a substitute to it. Instead of a bank of a nominal capital of fifty millions, he would establish a bank whose capital should not, at farthest, exceed twenty millions. He considered it as by no means important to its success that the Government should subscribe a cent to its capital stock; but as that was a fashionable idea, he would say a portion of the capital, five millions, should be subscribed by the Government; that the remaining fifteen millions should be subscribed by individuals, five millions of it at least in specie, the remainder either in Treasury notes at par, or in six per cent. stock of future loans at par, or six per cent. stock of former loans at the price at which it was contracted for with the Government. So far from such stock being inalienable, as now proposed, he would permit the directors to manage and dispose of it as they pleased. They might lend money to the Government if they found it to their interest and convenience to do so. He would abolish from such a charter the idea that the fiat of the President should at any time suspend the payment of specie by the bank, &c. If any plan of a National Bank could succeed, it must be on something like the plan of which this was the outline. To try the principle of this bill, and whether the House were disposed to accept any amendment whatever to it, Mr. G. concluded his speech by moving to strike out fifty millions (the proposed capital stock of the bank) and insert in lieu thereof twenty millions.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, of Kentucky, the Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, November 15.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, offered for consideration the following resolution, in conformity to a representation of the Legislature of Kentucky at the last session :

"Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying for wagons and horses lost in the campaign of the Northwestern Army, in that division of it commanded by General James Winchester."

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, moved that the resolution lie on the table, alleging as a reason therefor, that a general bill on the subject of such claims had been reported by the Committee of Claims, and was now before the House.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table accordingly.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, in introducing the following motion, remarked, that in the late calls of the militia from different parts of the United States, the persons composing most of the detachments had been compelled to leave their homes with that clothing suitable for the summer season, but unfit for that now approaching; and, in various instances, they were suffering for want of clothing fit for the season. They are unable to return for clothing, and in many instances are not able to procure it. To bring this subject before the House, Mr. E. moved "That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of War, on the application of the commanding officer of any detachment of the militia, to furnish the necessary clothing to such of the private soldiers of the militia as may require it, and to deduct the same from their pay."

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BIGELOW, a resolution was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, directing a copy of the public documents to be furnished to the Historical or Antiquarian Society of Massachusetts.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, offered the following resolution for consideration :

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing interest to the public creditors, whose balances have been stated at the Treasury."

Mr. EPPES inquired on what views this motion was grounded.

Mr. BRADLEY said he had understood that in some cases balances had been struck at the Treasury, in relation to army supplies particularly, and remained unpaid. He could not see why the United States should not pay the interest on such balances until they were paid.

Mr. EPPES said that in his report the Secretary of the Treasury had contemplated the issuing of debentures to all those persons to whom balances appeared to be due by Government, which, from the insufficiency of appropriations, or from other causes, had not been paid. He thought, therefore, this motion had better lie on the table, until the House had acted on that suggestion, or at least until it could be ascertained what were the amount and character of those balances. For his part, Mr. E. said, he had no knowledge of their existence. There might be some such, but if there were, they were small in amount and few in number. Such as they were, they might have arisen from the deficiency in the authorized loans; but he believed means were in operation for meeting all the demands of the Government without the intervention of any provision of this kind. He, therefore, moved that the resolution should lie on the table.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, a resolution was adopted requesting the Secretary of State to cause the members of Congress to be furnished with the volumes of the new Digest of the Laws as they might be respectively finished.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

The motion of Mr. GASTON to make the capital of the bank twenty instead of fifty millions of dollars, being still under consideration—

Mr. FISK, of New York, spoke in reply to Mr. GASTON's speech, and in explanation of the views of the Committee. He declined replying to Mr. G.'s objections to various details of the bill, until those details should come immediately under the consideration of the House; but applied his observations particularly to Mr. G.'s objections to the amount and character of the proposed capital of the bank. The objects of the Committee of Ways and Means in proposing such an institution, ought ever to be kept in view in this discussion. They were, generally, the revival and support of the public credit. These objects could be best accomplished: 1. By raising the value of the public stocks; and, 2. By the establishment of a competent circulating medium. Mr. F. then entered into an argument to show that the plan now before the House was that which would best accomplish these objects. He referred to the history of the former Bank of the United States, established with similar objects, and under like circumstances, and from its efficiency argued what might be expected from this bank. The Committee, in inquiring as to the amount of circulating medium which could be now advantageously employed, had fixed on fifty millions, which amount had also received the sanction of the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The present banking capital of the nation being estimated at an hundred millions, it was believed by the Committee that the addition of fifty millions would not be dangerous either to those institutions or to the community. Having thus determined on an increase of the circulating medium of the country, the next object was the appreciation of the value of the public stock. That stock had depreciated in value, not from any doubt of the ability or disposition of the Government to comply with its engagements to the public creditors, but from the quantity of the stock which it had been necessary to throw into market exceeding the means for purchasing it. A relief of the stock from its present depreciation was promised by the withdrawal of a part of it from the market; and with this view, it had been contemplated that twenty-four millions of the capital stock of the bank should be subscribed in Government securities. This, by taking so much stock out of the market, would raise the price of the stock, and make room for more which it might be necessary to create. It had been thought proper, too, that the United States should hold a part of the stock of the bank; to what amount, there had been some difference of opinion, and if the House thought too great a proportion was by this bill allowed to the United States, they would so decide. Mr. F. was willing, for himself, that the bank should be connected with the Government, and the Government with the bank, and that they should mutually support each other, &c. As to the share of the Government in the appointment of directors, while it could be no injury to the institution, it was necessary as well to guard the interest of the United States, as to take care of their interest in the security of the revenue in the various branches of the bank. Mr. F. took a comparative view of the situation of the nation now and in 1791, when the Bank of the United States was established, dwelling on the diminution of the public debt, and increase of the means of payment since that day; the increase of circulating medium, wealth, population, &c., from which he concluded there was ample employment for a bank of fifty millions now, as for a bank of fifty millions then. Of the ten millions capital of that bank, three-fourths of it was composed of public stock, as much depreciated at that day as public stock now is. The operation of that bank, he said, had been not only beneficial but wonderful, giving a spring to public credit, and raising the price of all public stock, as he believed this bank would, when once established. As to the specie capital, it was difficult, he remarked, to say how much specie would give confidence to the operations of the bank. The old Bank of the United States had commenced its operations on a specie capital of 400,000 dollars. He had no doubt, therefore, but this bank might safely commence its operations on a specie deposit of $1,200,000, which he believed there would be no difficulty in procuring. As to the confinement of the subscription to the stock created since the war, the Committee had deemed it proper to confine their object of raising the price of the public stock to such as was depreciated, viz: to that which had been created since the declaration of war, and which had depreciated, perhaps, because not so well supported by specific pledges of revenue as the old six per cent. stock. These various features were, however, in the hands of the Committee of the Whole, and entirely at their disposal, &c. Mr. F. spoke nearly an hour.

Mr. GASTON said, it was the established usage, when an important bill was under consideration in a Committee of the whole House, for the gentleman who was especially charged with its management, to present a distinct and connected view of the objects which it was designed to effect, and of the process by which they were to be accomplished. The propriety of such a course was obvious. It could answer no purpose to receive an explanation in detail of the disconnected parts of a scheme, until you were first apprized of the general nature of the whole. He had presumed that the gentleman who acted on this occasion as Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. FISK,) would have observed this approved practice, and on this vast and complicated project of the committee have come forward with a thorough statesman-like development of their plan. Nothing of the kind had been done. No exposition whatever had been given. This omission he particularly regretted, as it increased the difficulties of the undertaking in which he was about to engage.

As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, he had conceived it his duty to examine with some attention the proposed scheme of a National Bank. The result of that examination he should now submit, without apology, to the Committee of the Whole. Although he had but small pretensions to skill, either in the science or practice of banking, he might have collected by patient industry some views of the subject which the Committee would be willing to receive.

A well regulated National Bank, was, with Mr. G., a favorite institution. At this session he had voted for the resolution, declaring it expedient that one should be established. At the last he had supported a proposition brought forward but a few weeks before its close, by a gentleman from Tennessee, not now a member of this House, (Mr. GRUNDY,) contemplating such an institution; and, as a member of the committee then raised in pursuance of that proposition, had contributed his efforts towards the success of the measure. He believed that this Government ought never to be destitute of the aids which a National Bank was calculated to afford. It was essential, as an instrument of finance, for the easy collection, the safe keeping, and the judicious expenditure of the public revenue. To the nation, as distinguished from the Government, it was eminently beneficial. It was the only basis on which could be securely established a circulating medium commanding credit and confidence in every part of the United States. It had another tendency, which he deemed of infinite value—a tendency to connect, by a common bond of interest, the different sections of this Confederacy. Should the centrifugal force of any of the bodies of our system become excessive, such an interest would be a countervailing power of attraction to cause them to revolve steadily in their orbits.

It was mortifying to recollect that we once had a National Bank, which after an experience of twenty years was found to realize every hope that had been formed by its friends, and disappoint every expectation which had been raised by its enemies. At the very moment when it was in the full vigour of successful operation, when the Government and the nation were deriving from it every advantage which ought to have been wished, and when it was in our power to increase these advantages in degree by giving to the bank an increased efficiency; at this very moment we utterly subverted the establishment. In vain did the ancient and fast friends of Federal institutions raise their united voice against the ruinous measure. In vain did others, breaking through the trammels of prejudice and party, describe in prophetic terms the fatal consequences of the work of destruction. All efforts to save the establishment were unavailing; and the oracular admonitions of wisdom were treated as the phantoms of a heated imagination. What was then prophecy is now history—what was then theory, ably demonstrated, is now fact, universally admitted. The Committee of Ways and Means tell you in their report at the commencement of this session, “the want of some medium which, resting on a firm and solid basis, may unite public confidence, and have a general, instead of a local circulation, is now universally acknowledged. The stoppage of specie payments by the principal banks of the Middle States, has embarrassed greatly the operations of the Treasury, and, by confining the circulation of notes to the limits of the States within which they are issued, has deprived the Government of all the facilities in the remittance of money which was afforded while public confidence gave to bank notes a general circulation.” The head of the Treasury Department has officially declared, “that the condition of the circulating medium of the country presents a copious source of mischief and embarrassment. It may in general be affirmed that there exists at this time no adequate circulating medium, common to the citizens of the United States. The moneyed transactions of private life are at a stand; and the fiscal operations of the Government labor with extreme inconvenience. It is impossible that such a state of things should be long endured. The establishment of a national institution operating upon credit, combined with capital, and regulated by prudence and good faith, is, after all, the only efficient remedy for the condition of our circulating medium.” Sore indeed must be the distress which can extort such self-reproving acknowledgments from a dominant party, who not four years ago overturned as useless to the Government and pernicious to the nation, precisely such an institution, thus operating and thus regulated. It is much to be feared that these skilful “architects of ruin” may not be able to rear such an establishment as that which they prostrated.

It must be admitted that the present is not a favorable moment for engaging in the undertaking. It is now neither easy to procure the fit materials for this establishment, nor so to combine them as to make the work stable and permanent. Commercial restrictions, war, and blockade, have played sad havoc with capital, and credit is so depressed that it will be difficult to find anything bearing its stamp which can be advantageously united with capital. While all is unsettled within and threatening without, it is an arduous task to command, for any new establishment, the public confidence. Mr. G. said that he felt these difficulties in all their force. But he did not thence infer, as he believed did some of his most valuable and intelligent friends, that the attempt should be therefore forborne. These very difficulties proved a state of things that emphatically demanded some institution which might relieve credit and increase capital; which would afford facilities to combat external danger, and the means to retrieve internal derangement. Such an institution, at all times useful, was at this juncture indispensable. It was indeed to be lamented, that its foundations had not been laid deep in the day of prosperity; but they must be laid, if practicable, even now in the night of adversity, for now it is that it is so eminently needed. There was one impression, however, which he hoped that these difficulties would make upon the minds of the Committee. He trusted that they would inspire a salutary circumspection and prudence in examining well every step they might take. With their best caution, and adopting the wisest plans, it was far from certain that their scheme would succeed. But it was morally certain, that unless it were carefully arranged in all its parts, it must fail. This circumspection was the more necessary because of the danger of error from the severity of that pressure which called on them to act. At a moment when the Treasury was without money, and the Government almost destitute of credit; when every day added to our necessities, while it diminished the scanty means of supply; we were to found a great national institution, the consequences of which, good or evil, must be widely spread, and permanently felt. There was imminent danger, lest, in the prosecution of this purpose, we should regard too much its immediate influence upon our present exigency, and too little its more remote, yet more important and lasting effects. The largest object when removed to a vast distance, makes an angle on the eye so acute as to render it invisible, while a mote may be brought so near as to cover the pupil. In the plan now under consideration, he thought it demonstrable that this error of disregarding remote consequences had been committed; nay, he believed, that the eagerness to meet the immediate exigency had defeated its own purposes, as well as neglected to provide for the durable interests of the nation and the Government.

Mr. G. begged that gentlemen would accompany him in the view of the great outlines of this plan. A National Bank was to be established with a capital of fifty millions. This capital was to consist in the first place, of twenty millions of six per cent. United States debt, which the Government were to subscribe, in payment for two-fifths of the stock of the bank, and which was to be redeemed only at their pleasure. The remaining thirty millions were to be subscribed by individuals in shares of five hundred dollars each. These shares were to be paid for in three instalments. The first instalment on each share was to consist of $20 in gold or silver, $50 in Treasury notes, and $150 in the war stock, (as it was usually termed,) at their nominal value. The second and third instalments were to be composed of $40 cash, $25 Treasury notes, and $75 of the stock above mentioned. The bank was to commence its operations immediately on the payment of the first instalment. The Treasury notes on being received into the bank were to be converted into six per cent debt, redeemable at the will of the Government; and no part of the public debt held by the bank, was to be aliened during the war, nor afterwards, for less than its nominal value. This institution with all its appendages was to be governed by twenty-five directors, twenty of whom should be elected by the stockholders and five appointed by the President of the United States. It was to be obliged to lend to the Government, at an interest of six per cent, thirty millions of dollars; and the President during the war, and for five years afterwards, was to have the power of liberating it from the obligation to pay specie for its notes. This institution was to continue twenty years, during which the United States were bound not to establish any other.

The great purposes contemplated by this splendid scheme, other than those of a mere temporary nature, are the creation of an adequate medium of general circulation, and the affording to the Government of the necessary facilities in the collection, keeping, and distribution of its revenue. These are indeed most important purposes. It must be self-evident that no banking establishment can effect either of them unless it command the confidence of the public. This confidence must be the life-giving principle of the bank—without this vital spark it is a dead mass—useless, nay, noxious to the community. Without a confidence that the institution is at every moment competent to meet its engagements, who will receive the evidence of its engagements as cash? The bank note becomes then, and then only, a fit medium of circulation when every one believes that he can obtain for it, whenever his necessities may require, the gold or silver which it represents. Such a belief suspends the notes of a bank in circulation, and prevents them from being returned for payment the moment they are issued. It enables the bank to perform very extensive business without the issue of notes, by communicating to a credit on its books the character of money, so that such a credit passes through a hundred hands by the means of checks, without drawing from the bank either a dollar or a note. It is this belief which induces individuals to deposit with a bank their stores of treasure; and, without such a confidence, it never can be a fit place for the custody of the public revenue.

Now, sir, said Mr. G., whether you regard the capital on which this bank is to be founded, or the government to which it is to be subjected, or the operations which it will be required to perform, it is visionary to hope that you can for a moment command for it the confidence of the public. All the elements of its formation are calculated to excite distrust. It has every ingredient in its composition which can attract suspicion.

What is the efficient capital of the bank? The Government will subscribe, in new stock, twenty millions; individuals are to pay, in the present depreciated public debt, eighteen millions; and in Treasury notes, which are to be converted into Government stock, six millions. Six millions, the bill directs to be paid in coin. But, this will not be done. The bank is to go into operation when the first instalment is paid. There will then be received, of gold or silver, but one million two hundred thousand dollars. Now, when the scarcity of specie is taken into consideration, there is little doubt but that the directors will take care to accommodate themselves and their brother stockholders with loans to the amount of the cash part of the second and third instalments. I am persuaded that I make a very liberal allowance, when I say, that, of the six millions of specie required by the bill, not more than two will be paid, and the other four represented by stock or accommodation notes. This vast capital is, then, to be composed of forty-four millions of public debt, inalienable by the bank, and redeemable only at the will of the Government; four millions of individual debt, designed not to be redeemed, but on long credit; and two millions of specie. The bank has an efficient capital of but two millions: for, that portion of its capital which cannot be converted into cash, whenever cash may be required to meet demands upon it, affords no basis on which to support an issue of paper.

In the direction of the bank is there full security that prudence, ability, and strict attention to its interest will be found? Here we are presented with a feature in the plan of a very odious kind—the appointment of five of the directors by the President of the United States will have a most injurious effect on the credit of the institution, while it is utterly useless to the Government. The Committee will pardon a quotation of some length from a report of the illustrious Hamilton on a National Bank, showing decisively the impolicy of any interference by the Government in the appointment of its directors—

“To attach full confidence to an institution of this nature, it appears to be an essential ingredient in its structure, that it shall be under a private not a public direction, under the guidance of individual interest not of public policy; which would be supposed to be, and in certain emergencies, under a feeble or too sanguine administration, would really be liable to being too much influenced by public necessity. The suspicion of this would continually corrode the vitals of the credit of the bank, and would be most likely to prove fatal in those situations, in which the public good would require that they should be most sound and vigorous. It would indeed be little less than a miracle, should the credit of the bank be at the disposal of the Government, if, in a long series of time, there was not experienced a calamitous abuse of it. It is true that it would be the real interest of the Government not to abuse it; its genuine policy to husband and cherish it, with the most guarded circumspection, as an inestimable treasure. But what Government ever uniformly consulted its true interests in opposition to the temptations of momentary exigencies? What nation was ever blessed with a constant succession of upright and wise administrators?

"The keen, steady, and as it were magnetic sense, of their own interest as proprietors in the direction of a bank, pointing invariably to its true pole the prosperity of the institution, is the only security that can always be relied upon for a careful and prudent administration. It is therefore the only basis on which an enlightened, unqualified, and permanent confidence can be expected to be erected and maintained."

This great and practical statesman then proceeds to show, that a good Government has nothing more to wish for from a bank than that its concerns should be skilfully managed, and that such a Government always must have influence enough with the bank to procure a compliance with its reasonable desires. He then sums up the argument, and draws his conclusion: "It will not follow from what has been said that the State may not be the holder of a part of the stock of a bank, and consequently a sharer in the profits of it. It will only follow that it ought not to desire any participation in the direction of it." This hankering after a share in the administration of the bank has no adequate motive to justify it. The plausible and ordinary pretext is to secure the interest of the Government in the institution. But no such security is in fact afforded. On a former occasion an intelligent gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SEYBERT) placed the fallacy of this expectation in a point of view which would be weakened by an adoption of other language than his own. Speaking of a proposed appointment of directors by the Government, when the question of renewing the charter of the former United States Bank was before this House, he asks, "Who will such directors generally be? Certainly persons who need the aid of the bank, for none others would make application for the appointment. When they are appointed, they will be subservient to the views of such of the directors as are chosen by the stockholders; in their places they will lose sight of the public welfare; they will be interested by the accommodations which they may find necessary for their purposes; to obtain these they will yield to their associates. Instead of being the guardians of the public treasure in case of danger, they will remain silent until a spontaneous explosion of the bubble solves for the world the important secret of the insolvency of the institution." Let it be added, what the magnanimous soul of Hamilton could never have anticipated, and what the gentleman from Pennsylvania forbore to state; let it be added in answer to the question, "Who will such directors be?" that, according to the fixed usage of the existing Administration, they must be devotees of the party in power. The inquiry will not be, are they honest, or are they competent? but are they partisans staunch and true, and will their elevation promote the petty interests of faction? Such is the settled practice of the Executive in all civil appointments—I say civil appointments, for men of heterodox opinions are occasionally permitted to oppose themselves to the bullets of the enemy.

If in the capital, and in the administration of the bank, there is nothing found on which public confidence can fix itself, let us see whether its practical operations are likely to be such as may gradually attract this confidence. The first operation of the bank, after making the necessary discounts for enabling the directors and stockholders to pay for their shares, will be to loan to the Government thirty millions of dollars. Of this no one can doubt who knows our needs and has read this bill. This Government pays off these thirty millions of bank paper to its numerous creditors, and what then becomes of it? There is no confidence that the bank can be able to redeem it when presented, for it has not two millions of money. The Government indeed owes it seventy-four millions—fifteen per cent. more than its whole capital. But on this vast debt it cannot command a dollar, except the annual interest, and this will be paid to it in its own paper; it is not at liberty to require payment of any part of the principal, and it is forbidden to sell. Besides the little specie it may have, and the accommodation loans before spoken of, these seventy-four millions of Government debt constitute all its effects.

Not only therefore is the bank without money to meet the fifteenth part of its issues, but its credits are not of a nature to be converted into money. The bank carries on no business by which an artificial circulation is given to this paper; and which like the wonderful process of nature that propels the blood through the arteries, and returns it through the veins to be propelled again with equal warmth and vigor, sends it forth in well-timed discounts to be brought back in periodical payments again to be issued. The consequence inevitably is, that the paper is brought directly to the bank for redemption, and the various holders contend who shall be first in this race, till the President comes forth with his proclamation and frees the bank from the obligation to pay specie. Some exigency soon occurs to render an additional loan convenient to a needy Administration. The bank and the Executive are on the best possible terms—politically married—they "in one fate, their lives, their fortunes, and their beings blend." The bank lends as fast as the Executive can ask, and the Executive kindly protects the bank from the rude duns of saucy creditors. Thus there is thrown on the community an immense emission of paper which does not pretend to represent money, which is utterly worthless, except in consequence of a quality which the Government annexes to it, (and which it can give to any paper,) that of being receivable in payment of taxes. The great evil under which we labor, in relation to our circulating medium, is not a defect in its quantity, but in its value. We have paper enough, but we have little or no money. This deficiency of money, though no doubt produced by many causes, is in no small degree attributable to the superabundance of paper. Strange mistakes have prevailed upon this subject, where correct information might have been expected. It is perfectly ascertained in political economy, that no more paper of any kind can circulate in a country than is equal in value to the gold and silver, which would circulate there, if there was no paper. If more be thrown out than this circulation can employ, as there is no use for it at all, the surplus is returned upon the banks for gold and silver. When converted into this form an use is then found for it abroad, and it is exported, leaving the ordinary business of buying and selling within the country to be transacted through the agency of the paper circulation, which is adequate to the purpose. I have no doubt that in this way we are to account in a great measure for the scarcity of specie. And is this evil, and its concomitant, the depreciation of all bank paper, to be remedied by throwing more paper into market? Burke, with inimitable severity of humor, compares the reiterated issues of assignats by the Convention of France to the prescriptions of Moliere's candidate for the doctor's degree. The remedy is to be repeated as frequently as experience may prove its inefficacy. If the obstinate disease will not be cured, but becomes more and more exacerbated, why then, "repurger, resaigner"—"purge again, bleed again." Are you about to adopt the same course? Has an excessive issue of paper banished the precious metals from your country? Issue more paper. Is commercial intercourse destroyed; are the operations of the Treasury embarrassed; are all the moneyed institutions of the Middle and Southern States compelled to acts of bankruptcy, by the deluge of paper which has covered the country? Open the floodgates and pour forth a fresh inundation of paper. Assignats—assignats—more assignats!

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

And is it for the sake of an institution thus worthless, thus pernicious, that the solemn faith of the United States is to be pledged that no other bank shall be established for twenty years? The Government needs and the nation needs a bank founded on a solid basis, operating wisely, furnishing a circulation that will command universal confidence and credit, and capable of aiding the Administration in the management of its finances. Yet the possibility of making such an establishment is to be forbidden for twenty years, and this for the sake of a mere manufactory of paper! But this is not all. The Government binds itself to receive this paper in discharge of all public dues! Thus stipulating for its own bankruptcy, and rendering impracticable a compliance with its most solemn engagements. For, if it receive nothing but worthless paper, in what shall it pay its creditors—its domestic and foreign creditors? It will be unable to pay cash. It cannot dare to impose on them what is not the representative of cash.

If this view of the permanent consequences resulting from the proposed bank be correct, it must be regarded as a most ruinous project. Instead of resorting to it as the only efficient remedy for the mischiefs and embarrassments that now exist, we should reject it as big with evils infinitely more fatal than any we have yet endured.

Mr. G. here remarked that he had heard the example of the Bank of England, after the suspension of its specie payments, urged as an authority for the usefulness of an institution which should not be compelled to redeem its paper. He had not the leisure, nor indeed the information, which would be required to go into a full refutation of such an inference. But he could not forbear from stating some prominent facts which would put an end to this supposed analogy. The Bank of England had been established more than a century. It was so firmly rooted in the public confidence, that "safe as the Bank of England" had become a proverb. Though not in form connected with the Government, yet a mutual interest and a variety of concurrent operations had produced such a connexion, in fact, that the stability of one was a pledge for that of the other. All the private bankers in London transacted business on the credit of this bank; and these, by their connexion with the bankers throughout the Kingdom, sustained and everywhere extended this credit. Such were the ramifications through which the agency of this bank was spread, that there was not an individual in the Kingdom, possessing anything to lose, who directly or indirectly was not interested in its solidity. Yet with all these aids to uphold it—the most powerful (except the possession of cash to meet its engagements) that ever were or can be united to support any institution—thus sustained by ancient reverence, by universal interest, and by a stable Government, which determined to stand or fall with it—the interruption of specie payments gave it such a shock that it tottered to its base. Many of its friends feared, and most of our oracles predicted, its utter fall. The paper of the bank depreciated to a most alarming extent. And had not a prosperous commerce and the most fortunate political occurrences come in aid of the institution, it is difficult to conjecture how far such depreciation would have gone. Can a mere escape from destruction, by a suspension of specie payments, under all these singularly favorable circumstances, be viewed as an argument for the establishment of a bank, which is to begin by an issue of paper that it is known it cannot redeem? Because such a suspension did not utterly annihilate confidence in an ancient institution, does it follow that it will create confidence in a new one? There is nothing in the history of the Bank of England which can furnish an argument in favor of the proposed scheme.

But, sir, said Mr. G., I am perfectly aware that it is not so much the expectation of permanent benefit, as the hope of immediate succor from the proposed bank, that excites the zeal of its supporters. In a paroxysm of pain, the impatient sufferer often flies for relief to the empiric potion, although he knows that it is ultimately fatal.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

"The Treasury is empty, and public credit at the lowest stage of depression. Something must be done, and done immediately, to help the finances. What can be effectual but the establishment of a great National Bank?" Such is the general style of thought and expression among those who are most earnest for the passage of this bill. It cannot be denied, sir, that the fiscal concerns of this nation are in a state alarmingly critical, and emphatically require whatever of wisdom can be found in the Government to snatch them from ruin. But, let me conjure gentlemen not to be led away by this sense of danger into a hasty adoption of any measure which promises the embarrassment of our finances. It is always at such moments, in the history of nations, that daring adventurers and visionary projectors obtain a favorable reception of their desperate schemes. With the magnificence of promise, and the enthusiasm of presumption, they dazzle the imagination, and seduce the judgment of the ardent, the timid, the indolent, and the credulous. It was at such a moment as this, in the history of French finance, that the celebrated John Law came forward with his magnificent project. The old fashioned mode of redeeming public credit by economy, punctuality, and affording security to the creditors, was thought too slow a process for the exigencies of the time. A more rapid and complete remedy was desired; and who could fail to perceive such a remedy in his great Mississippi Bank? For a while it exceeded the expectations of the most credulous. Secured by the farms of all the farmed revenues in France, holding a monopoly of the African and East Indian commerce, and resting on a solid capital of the fertile lands and golden mines of the Mississippi, it gained the public confidence, and commanded all the specie of the Kingdom. Its stock rose to an enormous value, and the circulation of its paper seemed to have no bounds. But, in practice, it was unable to meet its engagements and to redeem its paper. In vain did Government interpose to uphold the credit of the institution. Confidence was withdrawn; circulation ceased; the bubble burst; thousands were ruined, and the finances degraded far below their former debasement. If the proposed plan is to afford relief to our necessities, it cannot be difficult to discover it. This is not a matter of faith, but of calculation. Whence is this relief, and what is the amount of it? It will be said that the bank is to accommodate the Government, at six per cent., with a loan of thirty millions of dollars. Such a loan is absolutely necessary to our wants; perhaps can be nowhere else obtained, and certainly not upon as moderate terms. Let this suggestion be examined for a moment, and all that is plausible in it vanishes. In what does the bank make this loan? Not in money, for it has it not; not in the representative of money, for its issues are made on a capital of irredeemable public debt; not in paper that will command money, for the bank, as we have seen, must be immediately relieved from the obligation to pay specie. In what then is this loan made? In paper having no value except that it represents the engagements of an institution whose only wealth consists in the engagements of the Government, and answering no purpose of circulation except that the Government has made it receivable in payment of taxes. Is it not manifest that the direct engagements of the Government must have at least equal value with that paper which ultimately represents them; and that these engagements may equally be made receivable in commutation of taxes? Then the simple meaning of this transaction is to procure paper engagements of a suitable form and devices to be prepared for the Government, and to pay the manufacturers for their trouble (at the rate of six per cent. on the nominal amount manufactured) one million eight hundred thousand dollars per annum. This is a very expensive establishment, sir. You can surely have your Treasury notes equally well struck, and filled up, and signed, at a much less cost. And none can doubt but that they will answer every purpose of the Treasury bank notes. Unless swindling be designed, there is something preposterous in the idea that A, who has capital, cannot attempt a circulation of his own negotiable paper, but gives his bond to B, who has no capital, and obtains B's notes in the expectation that they will circulate freely on his [A's] promise to take them in payment of debts, as though they were his own. But the idea approaches to insanity when A regularly pays interest on the bond to B for the use of these notes, which draw no interest, and whose sole claim to credit is derived from their connexion with that bond, and from his consent to treat them with respect. The only quality which these bank notes can possess, entitling them to confidence, or fitting them to be the medium of circulation, is that which the Government imparts to them—of being receivable in payment of taxes. If it annex this quality to its own paper, and makes it as convenient for receipts and payments as the notes of this paper bank, an immense saving is made, and every beneficial purpose equally answered. It is idle to imagine that the engagements of an institution, whose capital is composed of Government debt, can have any other credit than those of the Government itself. The whole foundation on which either can rest, is the credit of the Government. If you seek a further basis you but imitate the Indian sage, who rested his world on the back of an huge elephant, who stood on the back of an immense tortoise, who stood on he knew not what.

We are told one immediate benefit to result from this institution is, that it will absorb twenty-four millions of Government stock now in the market, and make room for the Government to throw more stock into it. This is surely a delusion. Six millions of Government securities in the form of Treasury notes, and eighteen millions in the form of six per cent. stock, will be made to assume the form of United States Bank stock. But this bank has a capital consisting almost exclusively of Government securities. Shares in this capital are then, in fact, little else than evidences of an interest in these securities. These twenty-four millions of Government stock are not actually removed from the market, but remain there under a different name. Instead of being transferred as Treasury notes, or as Government six per cents., they are assigned as bank stock. No burden is thereby taken from the market; no ability to loan is communicated to any one; no demand for Government paper created.

But the principal advantage which is boasted of, as resulting from this bank, is the revival of public credit by the appreciation of the public debt. This consideration is entitled to attention, both because it is somewhat plausible, and because it is much insisted on by the friends of the scheme. Public credit, at all times important to the nation, is now, when revenue is exhausted, and a war of immense expenditures pressing upon the Treasury with daily increasing demands, of incalculable value. This faculty, known to be exceedingly impaired by late occurrences, is to be renovated by imparting value to certain evidences of the public debt now much depreciated in the market. I am utterly unable to perceive how the result is to be produced. A high price of Government stock is often an indication of the healthful state of public credit. When every species of Government stock is at full price, not from the operation of accidental or temporary, but of permanent and regular causes, it may be regarded as an unequivocal evidence of sound public credit. But an artificial value communicated for a moment to a part of the public debt, not extending to the rest nor promising long continuance, is a proof of irregular excitement, indicating diseased, not vigorous, credit. To revive public credit by imparting an extraneous value to stock seems about as wise as to restore health by an artificial coloring of the cheek. Superficial observers may be cheated by the appearance; the credulous experimenter may for a moment delude himself, but the mistake of either cannot last long.

Let us examine a little more in detail the effect which this bank is to produce on the public stock and the public credit. There is now in market (I speak in round numbers) sixty millions of Government debt created since the war, which, at an average, may be said to be worth in specie seventy dollars in the hundred. By allowing twenty-four millions of this debt to be subscribed at its nominal price in payment for bank shares, it is supposed that you will create a demand for this stock, which will raise it to eighty-five or ninety. But, after the twenty-four millions are subscribed, the residue having no new value communicated to it, will preserve its former place in the market. Thus far nothing is seen but a mere stock-jobbing operation—an adventitious price given to public securities to enable the present holders to get rid of them at the expense of others in whose hands they are to depreciate. But the twenty-four millions subscribed are converted into bank stock; and, as it is presumed bank stock will be at par, these twenty-four millions are raised in value from sixteen millions eight hundred thousand dollars to their nominal amount. This may be a correct statement—and here there is a clear gain of seven millions two hundred thousand dollars; but, if I may be allowed a phrase of the gentleman near me, (Mr. WRIGHT,) I would ask, "Cui bono?" to whom does this gain accrue? Eight millions distributed among the holders of certain favored stock may be a vast help to their financial operations, but I do not see how our finances are thereby aided, or our credit restored. The practical definition of credit is the ability to buy and borrow cheap—how this ability is increased by legislating fortunes to a few at the expense of the community is not very obvious. Do you expect that those whom you thus enrich will lend you from gratitude? They will remember the fate they have so narrowly escaped, and be careful how they again incur the risk of bankruptcy. Will others be eager to lend you from the hope of similar favors? You have put it out of your power to oblige, for you can make no more banks.

A very strange opinion prevails in relation to the holders of this war stock. It seems to be supposed that Government is under some obligation to raise its price. So far as its value is to be effected by a punctual, faithful, and liberal compliance with the engagements of the Government, no man more sincerely wishes its rise than myself. I have joined in the pledge to give it full security by an adequate sinking fund before the close of this session, and I certainly shall be ready to redeem my pledge. I will concur in any plan which may be requisite to provide for the faithful payment of the interests, and the honest reimbursement of their principal. Thus far I go, for thus far the Government is morally bound to go; but to do more than this, to make a bank for them, is to legislate, not for the nation, but for individuals.

From what I have said it is manifest that, whatever may be my predilection for a National Bank, it is impossible that I should sanction the plan which is now proposed. Its general and permanent effects I regard as most pernicious; its immediate consequences without adequate benefit to counteract its expense to Government, and wearing too much the appearance of a mere stock-jobbing operation. While I disapprove the scheme submitted, I owe it to candor to state what plan I would be ready to support. Let the capital of the bank be reduced to a manageable size. The Bank of England, the only incorporated institution of the kind within the Kingdom, has a capital less than twenty millions sterling, the paper of which is a sufficient medium for the collection of a revenue of eighty millions. Ours, surely, will be large enough if we make it equal to our revenue, twenty millions of dollars. I am not anxious that the Government should take an interest in it, especially as, at this moment, it is not advisable to contract more debts than are unavoidable. But, as this is a fashionable idea, I would consent that the United States should subscribe for five millions of this stock. Of the remaining fifteen millions, five millions, at least, should be paid, actually paid, in specie; and ten might be subscribed in Treasury notes, or stock hereafter to be created, at par. The appreciation of these notes, or of this stock, would be taken into consideration at the time of issuing them, and its benefit thus accrue directly to the Government. In favor of existing stock, I would agree that it might be received in lieu of new stock or Treasury notes, but at its original contract prices with Government. Either this would be a beneficial privilege, or it would not. If a privilege, and therefore embraced, the Government would derive a profit of the difference on all the subscribed stock between the contract and nominal price, by way of bonus for the charter; and if it should not be regarded as a privilege, there is no compulsion on the holder of the stock to subscribe. The direction of the bank should be confided solely to the officers selected by the stockholders. The institution should be left free to pursue its interest, and under no obligation to lend to the Government. It should be compelled to redeem all its issues by gold and silver, and, whenever it needed an addition of specie to its capital, it might sell any portion of its public debt to procure it. Such an establishment, honestly and prudently managed, would be a basis on which to support a circulating medium adequate to our wants and deserving of our confidence. Such an establishment would afford to the Government all the facilities it could wish for collecting, keeping, and disbursing its revenue. These great purposes answered, must essentially aid the public credit. Other aids it should have, which are not to be obtained through any bank. Giving full security to the public creditor, not by a pledge of faith, but of funds; provide competent revenue for paying him his interest, and be punctual in the payment; and, above all, put down all profusion, and extravagance, and waste—economy will save the necessity of immense loans. These things done, all will be accomplished which, while the war continues, is on your part practicable, and the issue must then be trusted to Providence.

To ascertain, sir, how far my opinions may be acceptable to the Committee, I move you to amend the first section of the bill, where it provides for the capital of this bank, by striking out the word "fifty," and inserting, in lieu thereof, "twenty."

Mr. FISK made some remarks by way of resisting the attack which he said the gentleman had to-day made from the same battery as he yesterday opened on the bill. He denied the applicability of some of his remarks, particularly of that in relation to Law's scheme, which arose from that bank's having issued a vast amount of paper on its capital, founded on the fictitious value of certain land certificates, &c., an excess of folly into which no properly regulated bank was in any danger of falling, &c.

The question on Mr. GASTON'S motion to strike out fifty and insert twenty millions, was then decided as follows: For the motion 47, against it 79.

So the motion was negatived.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, of Massachusetts, among the places at which subscription books should be opened, Hallowell in Maine was inserted, and three persons named as commissioners.

Mr. CONDUCT, of New Jersey, said he thought it would be good policy to permit as large a portion of the agricultural community to contribute to the stock as possible. With this view he moved to increase the number of shares from one to five hundred thousand, and reduce the amount of each share to one instead of five hundred dollars.

Mr. FISK, of New York, opposed this motion. The shares, he conceived, were made sufficiently small to enable every one so disposed to participate in the bank; while a still further subdivision of the stock would produce great embarrassment, and a total derangement of the details of the bill, and much difficulty in apportioning the proportions of stock, Treasury notes, and specie, to be paid on each share.

The motion was rejected, yeas 32.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, proposed to substitute, for the provision respecting the manner of taking subscriptions for this stock, a provision for dividing its capital stock among the several States in proportion to their representation; so that all the members of the Union might equally participate in the benefits of such subscription. He had no doubt the subscriptions would be advantageous to the individuals, inasmuch as he believed the stock would be greatly above par as soon as the bank went into operation. Not having, however, had time to prepare an amendment to meet his wishes, he should waive his motion for the present, until the bill was gone through.

After making further verbal amendments to the first section, the second section of the bill was read, in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person, copartnership, or body politic, to subscribe for so many shares of the said capital stock of the said bank, as he, she, or they, shall think fit, not exceeding one thousand shares; except as is hereinafter provided for the subscription on behalf of the United States; and the sums respectively subscribed, except on behalf of the United States, as is hereinafter provided, shall be payable in the manner following, that is to say: one-fifth part thereof in gold or silver coin of the United States; three-fifth parts thereof in gold or silver coin of the United States, or in the public debt of the United States, contracted by virtue of the act of Congress, entitled "An act authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding eleven millions of dollars," passed the fourteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, or contracted by virtue of any subsequent act and acts of Congress, authorizing a loan, or loans; and one-fifth part thereof in gold or silver coin, or in Treasury notes, issued under the act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes;" passed the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, or issued under the authority of any subsequent act or acts of Congress, authorizing Treasury notes to be issued. And the said payment shall be made and completed in the sums and at the times hereinafter declared, that is to say: at the time of subscribing, there shall be paid twenty dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin, and two hundred dollars more in gold or silver coin, or in the public debt and Treasury notes aforesaid, in the proportions aforesaid. At the expiration of four calendar months, after the time of subscribing, there shall be paid the further sum of forty dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin, and one hundred dollars in gold and silver coin, or in the public debt and Treasury notes aforesaid, in the proportions aforesaid. At the expiration of six calendar months, from the time of subscribing, there shall be paid the further sum of forty dollars, in gold or silver coin, and one hundred dollars in gold or silver coin, or in the public debt and Treasury notes aforesaid, in the proportions aforesaid. And the subscriptions in public stock and Treasury notes, as aforesaid, shall be taken and credited for the principal, and so much of the interest thereof, respectively, as shall have accrued on the day of subscribing the same.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, moved to amend this section by adding thereto a proviso, in the following words:

"Provided, That no interest shall accrue on the Public Stock or Treasury notes paid by the subscribers as a part of the capital of the bank during the continuance of the charter."

The reason assigned by Mr. HALL was, that the bank would draw a double interest on the stock part of the capital, viz: six per cent. on the stock, and a per centage from the operations of the bank upon that stock.

Mr. FISK opposed this motion, and expressed much surprise at it. He thought the moral sense of the Government must revolt at its injustice: besides, that it would destroy all possibility of organizing a bank on the principles proposed by the bill.

The motion of Mr. HALL was negatived, very few voices only appearing in favor of it.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, moved so to amend the bill as to make it optional to subscribers to pay in the whole of their shares (except the specie part) in six per cent. stock, instead of compelling them to pay in a part of the subscription in Treasury notes.

This motion was opposed by Mr. FISK, of New York, and negatived, yeas only 43.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Massachusetts, made a motion, the object of which was, in the provision respecting the subscription of a certain proportion of the capital in stock of the loans created since the war, to substitute in lieu thereof the stock "in loans hereafter to be contracted by authority of any act of Congress, passed or to be passed during the present session."

Mr. B. said, that the bill, as it now stood, would afford no real advantage to the Government unless it were in the privilege of borrowing thirty millions of dollars from the bank. The intention of the charter proposed to be granted by the bill, was, to authorize the individuals associating to issue paper money—notes which would promise to pay nothing but paper—for, he contended, whether the provision authorizing the President, on certain occasions, to suspend payment of specie, were adopted or not, the institution would be nothing but a bank of paper money; and he could see no advantage the Government could derive from borrowing thirty millions of paper money. If, however, this bank should be advantageous or profitable to stockholders, he could see no reason why those who had lent the Government money since the declaration of war, should have any advantage over any present or future stockholders. They had obtained, he conceived, sufficient discount beyond the six per cent. interest for the loans they had made—and yet, it appeared to him, from an examination of this bill, that its whole object was to benefit this description of persons. If this bank should go into operation, which he doubted—even should the bill pass, what, he asked, would be the consequence? Ignorant and unwary men would purchase the public stock, at par, from those who contracted for it and now hold it, and presently the bubble would burst, and these purchasers become the losers by the scheme. If the individuals who took the last loans had been permitted to devise a bill for their particular advantage, they could not have drawn one to suit them better.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, proposed to submit, in lieu of Mr. BRADBURY's motion, an amendment which he had prepared. If the House meant to do perfect justice to themselves, to their country, and to the United States, he said they would be indisposed to put the public stock, redeemable at the will and pleasure of the Government, on the same footing as specie; and, if that stock were permitted to be subscribed, at the contract price, it would be a sufficient bonus to the stockholders that their stock was converted into bank capital, which would immediately rise to 50 or 60 per cent. above par. In such a provision as he proposed, there would be nothing coercive; the stockholder might or might not subscribe his stock; if he did, he would be placed on the same footing as the rest of the community. Mr. W. wished, therefore, to admit any stock to be subscribed of the past or future loans at the contract price.

Mr. BRADBURY declined assenting to this substitute to his motion, which, however, he modified by adding to the end of it the words, "at its par value," thus proposing to allow subscriptions to the bank in the stock of any future loan, at its par value.

Mr. FISK opposed Mr. BRADBURY's motion with considerable warmth. If they could not aid the public credit, he said, he hoped Congress would refrain from doing anything which should injure it. The public creditor had generally gone to the extent of his means in purchasing the public stock now lying on his hands. But it never could have entered into his calculation that the Government would adopt any measure calculated directly to bear on him, as the creation of a new stock on different footing certainly would, by giving it the advantage in the market over him. Such a course pursued by a Government, of exercising its power to serve its own purposes, instead of pursuing a course of magnanimous policy, must, Mr. F. said, be repugnant to every sentiment of morality as well as justice, which ought to be observed by nations. It would be an iniquitous delusion practised on the community, inasmuch as the depreciation of public stock does not now arise so much from distrust of the Government as from inability of the people to lend, which ability could not be increased by giving this sort of privilege to the stock in any subsequent loans, &c. Such a discrimination as is proposed would so weaken the confidence in the public faith, that he did not believe, after adopting it, the Government would be able to obtain further loans on any terms.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, in a very decided manner, reprobated the adoption of this amendment. It was pretty well understood; he said, that the Government had exhausted almost to the last cent the ability of the nation to obtain loans under the existing state of things. It was true, that while this House was recently debating on the three million loan bill, he had suggested, and it was the fact, that the Executive was negotiating a part of the six million loan. They had hopes, also, to obtain, under the bill last proposed, a loan to enable them to redeem the Treasury notes becoming due in this quarter. But, how could this body expect this Government should, in the hour of most need and difficulty, obtain those resources which are indispensable to the fulfilment of the public engagements, if gentlemen, first on one day and then on another, should persist in introducing motions and speeches in respect to the present creditors which must have an injurious effect on future loans? No doubt, the gentleman in this motion, thought he was advocating the interests of his country; but, unfortunately, by one and another proceeding, public credit was injured and the operations of Government retarded. Remarks had been made on this floor, and he alluded emphatically to those unfortunately made by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JACKSON,) who he regretted was not now in his seat, which had a more deleterious effect on public credit than that gentleman could possibly have expected or wished. They were certainly not authorized by sound policy, and he would venture to say, so far as they respected the public credit, the redemption of the public debt, and payment of past and future loans, were not sanctioned by the Administration or any member of it. He would not support any men or Administration that supported such a doctrine; and, so far as the doctrine had been advocated by one of his political friends, he declared the opinions expressed were not his; that they were unworthy of any party, of any Government, of any Administration, or any member of it. As to this bill, he entertained Constitutional objections to the establishment of any bank; if they could be removed, he might vote for this bill. He did not rise to speak of its merits, but to protest against propositions calculated to weaken if not destroy all confidence in the public faith. It had been assigned as a reason for such a motion, that speculators had preyed on the public credit. This he denied. The Government had gone on, relying on the public credit alone to support its loans, until the terms on which they could be obtained had fallen from par to 88, from 88 to 80, &c. The Government had been compelled to have money, and had bought it as low as they could. As to the terms of the ten million loan, on which so much had been said, Mr. H. said it was only an adaptation to that loan by Mr. Campbell of the terms on which Mr. Gallatin had, without censure, obtained the sixteen million loan, and in consequence of which last engagement the terms of the loan had been more than once varied, &c. Nay more, he said the terms allowed by Mr. Campbell were less advantageous to the contractors than those allowed by Mr. Gallatin; so that the blame thrown on him was imputable not to the terms of the late loan, but to the inability of the Government to borrow, &c. Mr. H. protested against the principle of this amendment. If the House resorted to invidious discriminations between the public creditors, he admonished them that they would paralyze their own arm, and arrest the future operations of the Government.

Mr. GHOLSON said he sincerely regretted that the animadversions of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HAWKINS) on the speech of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JACKSON,) on the loan bill, had not been made while that gentleman was present, so that he might have had an opportunity of vindicating himself before the Committee and the nation. Mr. G. observed that he did not recollect the remarks of his friend (Mr. JACKSON) with sufficient distinctness to attempt to state the substance of them to the Committee. He, however, did not understand them to be such as could be construed into an indisposition to pay the public debt. Mr. G. said he applauded the zeal which had been manifested by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky in favor of the public credit. With that gentleman, he ardently hoped that ample provision would be made at the present session for the punctual payment of the interest, and for the redemption within a reasonable time of the last cent of the principal of every description of the public debt.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, said, they had arrived at that part of the bill, on which he presumed there would be the greatest diversity of opinion. The subject was highly important, and worthy of mature consideration. He therefore moved that the Committee now rise, to allow time for further reflection on it.

The Committee rose accordingly, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, November 16.

RUFUS EASTON, returned to serve as the Delegate from the Territory of Missouri, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were discharged from the several petitions referred to them, complaining of the conveyance of the mails on the Sabbath day, and they were referred to the Postmaster General.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill making provision for the widows and orphans of soldiers who die, or are killed in the service of the United States.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported that there was no occasion for any provision in respect to the furnishing of militia with clothing, as contemplated by the resolve adopted yesterday—such a provision being already in existence.

The engrossed resolution for presenting a copy of the Public Documents to the Antiquarian Society of Massachusetts, was read a third time and passed.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. RHEA's motion, requiring that every bill under discussion shall be gone through, before the adjournment, on the day it is taken up. This motion, on suggestion of Mr. BRADLEY and Mr. OAKLEY, was so modified as to require the question under discussion to be decided on the day on which it is made. Thus amended, the motion was opposed with wit and argument by Messrs. WRIGHT, PITKIN, DUVAL, GHOLSON, MACON, FORSYTH, and ALEXANDER, and supported by Messrs. RHEA, of Tennessee, and FISK, of New York. Mr. CONDUCT moved to postpone it indefinitely. At length, to put an end to an unprofitable discussion, the House, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, proceeded to the orders of the day.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

At the request of Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, who desired to propose another amendment, Mr. BRADBURY, of Massachusetts, withdrew the amendment he offered yesterday. A great part of his object, he said, had been answered, by arresting the attention of the Committee on this subject.

Mr. CALHOUN then, in a very ingenious and elaborate speech, laid before the House his views on this subject, and the reasons why he should propose a total change in the features of the bill. The motion he now made was one of limited character, but such a one as he proposed to follow up by other amendments, or by distinct Legislative provisions, which should together embrace a plan of which the following is a brief outline: The capital of the bank remaining unchanged, at fifty millions, the payments of subscriptions to this capital stock to be made in the proportion of one-tenth in specie (which he afterwards varied to six-fiftieths) and the remainder in specie, or in Treasury notes to be hereafter issued; subscriptions to be opened monthly in the three last days of each month, beginning with January next, for certain proportions of the stock, until the whole is subscribed—payment to be made at the time of subscribing; the shares to consist of one hundred instead of five hundred dollars each; the United States to hold no stock in bank, nor any agency in its disposal, nor control over its operations, nor right to suspend specie payments. The amount of Treasury notes to be subscribed, viz. forty-five millions, to be provided for by future acts of Congress, and to be disposed of in something like the following way, viz: fifteen millions of the amount to be placed in the hands of the agents, appointed for the purpose, or in the hands of the present Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to go into the stock market, to convert the Treasury notes into stock; another sum, say five millions, to be applied to the redemption of the Treasury notes becoming due at the commencement of the ensuing year; the remaining twenty millions he proposed to throw into circulation as widely as possible. They might be issued in such proportions monthly as to be absorbed in the subscriptions to the bank at the end of each month, &c. This operation, he presumed, would raise the value of Treasury notes perhaps twenty or thirty per cent. above par, being the value of the privilege of taking the bank stock, and thus afford at the same time a bonus and an indirect loan to the Government; making unnecessary any loan by the bank until its extended circulation of paper shall enable it to make a loan which shall be advantageous to the United States. The Treasury notes so to be issued to be redeemable in stock at six per cent., disposable by the bank at its pleasure, and without the sanction of Government; to whom neither is the bank to be compelled to loan any money. This, it is believed, is, in a few words, a fair statement of the project of Mr. CALHOUN, which he supported by a variety of explanations of its operations, &c.; the notes of the bank, when in operation, to be received exclusively in the payment of all taxes, duties, and debts to the United States. The operation of this combined plan, Mr. C. conceived, would be to afford, 1. Relief from the immediate pressure on the Treasury; 2. A permanent elevation of the public credit; and, 3. A permanent and safe circulating medium of general credit. The bank should go into operation, he proposed, in April next. He concluded his exposition by a motion, the effect of which is to deprive the United States of any share in the stock of the bank, and to change the proportions of specie and paper in which it shall be payable to one-tenth in specie, and nine-tenths in Treasury notes.

This motion opened a wide and interesting scene of debate.

Mr. FISK attacked Mr. CALHOUN's proposition with considerable zeal, principally on two points: its failure to provide for the present absorption of United States stock, and the difficulty which would occur in the circulation and disposal of so immense a mass of Treasury notes. He drew a comparison between Mr. CALHOUN's projet and that of the Committee of Ways and Means, highly favorable to the latter.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, opposed the adoption of this proposition, and examined the features of the amendment proposed by Mr. CALHOUN, and the arguments advanced in favor of it. He was opposed to it in nearly all its features, and greatly preferred the plan reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. His arguments were principally in reply to those of Mr. CALHOUN, which he generally pronounced to be erroneous and delusive.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, replied at considerable length to Mr. FORSYTH, and vindicated the proposition of Mr. CALHOUN, in an able argument on the principal points of objection urged by Mr. FORSYTH, and in illustration of the principles of the bill. He showed what he believed a decided superiority of the amendment over the original project of the Committee of Ways and Means.

When Mr. LOWNDES ended his speech, the debate on the main question terminated, and this day's sitting ended with the following skirmishing debate, during the whole of which the Chairman and the members of the House were endeavoring to limit the debate to the question before the House.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, after remarking on the very high importance of this subject, and the magnitude of the change which this amendment proposed to introduce into the principles of the bill, and the obvious necessity of further time for consideration of so important an amendment, moved that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, with much warmth, opposed this motion. He feared, if the House were to adjourn without deciding on this motion, coming from the imposing quarter whence it did, and supported with so much ability from the gentleman from South Carolina, it would arrest the loan of three millions, and even the nine million loan, which were absolutely indispensable to support the Military Establishment and other departments of the Government. What, then, he asked, would become of the soldier who is now in a Northern climate, depending on the fate of these loans for his pay, clothing, and sustenance? Whoever, in the face of such considerations, should vote to rise without deciding on this proposition, possessed, he said, more courage and philosophy of temper than he would boast. He hoped the Committee would not rise without deciding on this motion.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he hoped the Committee would rise. This was the very question, how money should be raised, whether by Treasury bills or by any other mode, which more than any other required the deliberate decision of Congress. It was not a question simply of paying the militia of the army now out, but of establishing a system which should enable the Government to discharge all the demands against it. It was all-important, on such a subject as this more than on any other, to vote considerably and after deliberation. The proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina he considered to be generally advantageous; but he had some objections to it, which he wished an opportunity to submit. He hoped, before deciding on a subject like this, the House would take due time to deliberate on a proposition to throw into circulation fifty millions of Treasury notes, trusting to the bank for their absorption.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, said he hoped the Committee would not rise. He wished, before rising, that they would decide upon the proposition before them; not, however, for the reasons expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He did not, like that gentleman, conceive that the decision on this amendment could affect the loans; for one, he said, he protested against loans made, or to be made, on the expectation of the creation of a bank to give a bonus to the holders of the public stock, in addition to that which they have already contracted to receive from the Government. It was important that some decision on this subject should immediately take place, which had been already three days debated; and he knew of no plan which would be so operative as that now proposed by his friend from South Carolina, whose arguments, he said, together with those of his colleague, (Mr. LOWNDES,) were something like mathematical demonstration.

Mr. OAKLEY denied any weight to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and allowed almost as little to the argument of Mr. SHARP, that three days had been consumed in the discussion of this subject. He should, for his part, say that three weeks might be well employed in the discussion of a project for establishing a bank with a capital of fifty millions of dollars—a capital sufficiently large to influence the destinies of this nation to future ages. He was friendly to the main principles of Mr. CALHOUN's proposition; but he was not certain but there might be radical objections to some of them. He hoped some indulgence would be afforded to those who, like him, wished to deliver their opinion on this subject.

Mr. INGHAM remarked, that the House had been sitting here nine weeks, and not a single measure had been definitively adopted for the support of the public credit. Delay and procrastination had taken place day after day; and, if the House were to wait until every gentleman was satisfied as to every word and letter in a bill, it would never get through one. The very suggestion of such an amendment as that now under consideration would, he said, produce ill consequences. It ought to be determined, therefore, as early as possible. He did know, that a speech (Mr. JACKSON's) delivered in this House had depressed the price of stocks in Philadelphia full two and a half per cent. The proposition now before the House, he feared, would depress them still further; and, when the public stock was in a state of depression, going down, down, down, he was unwilling the House should take any course which should still further prostrate it.

Mr. FISK hoped the Committee would not be induced to rise, at the early hour of three o'clock, by the old plea of want of time for consideration. It was important now to act, and that the whole course of proceedings of the House should be reformed, and one of greater energy and promptitude substituted.

Mr. GROSVENOR said this was no ordinary subject, on which men could make up their minds in a moment; and, although some gentlemen might be prepared to vote on it, he hoped they would allow some time to those who desired to reflect before they voted on a question of so great moment.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, November 17.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report unfavorable to the allowance of a bounty for the destruction of vessels of the enemy at sea. Ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, of Maryland,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be directed to inquire into the expediency and necessity of providing by law for the punishment of persons voluntarily holding intercourse with the enemy without the permission of the Government.

A letter was received from the Acting Secretary of State, setting forth that all the material papers in that office were saved on the late incursion of the enemy into this District.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that this report, together with all the other letters received from other Departments on the same subject, be entered on the Journal of the House. The motion was negatived.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

The amendment yesterday proposed by Mr. CALHOUN to the bill being still under consideration, an amendment was moved thereto by Mr. FISK, of New York, and accepted by the House, authorizing the receipt of foreign gold and silver coin (as well as gold and silver coin of the United States) in payment for the subscriptions to the stock of the Bank at certain rates expressed in the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, in the course of a few remarks on the motion of Mr. CALHOUN, expressed his approbation of the principle, and avowed a decided preference to the plan it embraces over that contained in the original bill.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill so as to preclude anything but Treasury notes from being received in payment of the forty-four millions, which are now proposed to be payable in specie or in Treasury notes. His object was to prevent the latter payments into the bank from being made by the aid of accommodation from the bank after it goes into operation.

After some conversation, Mr. S. withdrew his amendment with a view of offering it in some future stage of the discussion.

Mr. INGHAM.—Mr. Chairman, as the question on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) now recurs, I beg leave to submit a few observations before it is decided. No member of this Committee can be more sensible than I am of the disadvantages I shall have to contend with in entering the lists against either of the honorable gentlemen from South Carolina who have supported the amendment; and I am now fully conscious that I shall fail to communicate my ideas with that perspicuity which alone can give them their proper force and effect; yet I am emboldened by the importance of the occasion, and shall rely upon the intelligence of the Committee and the subject itself to supply all other deficiencies. The amendment under consideration, taken in connexion with the suggestions of the honorable mover, contemplates a radical change of all the principal features of the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means; it will, therefore, be necessary, in order to contrast the two plans, to notice that which has been proposed by the committee somewhat at large, though I shall endeavor to be as brief as the subject will possibly admit. It will be seen that the only important features of the bill are: First, the amount of the capital stock. Second, the character of it. Third, the loan to the Government of $30,000,000; and Fourth, a qualified power to suspend specie payments. To all these points objections have been urged, either by the gentleman from South Carolina or the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) and a particular examination of them becomes necessary as a preliminary to the examination of the amendment. First, with respect to the amount of capital. The bill proposes a capital of $50,000,000; it is sufficiently apparent that the establishment of the proposed bank is designed as an instrument in aid of other measures, to revive the public credit, and thereby enable the Government to procure the necessary resources to prosecute the war with such effect as to bring a speedy and honorable peace. But we find that, since the commencement of the war, the public stocks have suffered a gradual depression up to the present year, when it seems that loans on any terms are totally at an end. The reason of this is obvious; we have borrowed and attempted to borrow too much, and have not resorted, as we ought to have done, to a more enlarged system of internal revenue. It is unnecessary to go back farther. What is the present state of things? We find the market exhausted of the money and overloaded with the public debt. In addition to this misfortune, we find, literally, no circulating medium in the nation. What then is to be done? You cannot borrow; you cannot impose taxes to the extent of your demands, and even those which are laid, cannot be paid in money that will answer the purposes of the Government. The answer is plain. By withdrawing a portion of the encumbering mass of stock from the market, you relieve it from its pressure—a pressure which bids defiance to your efforts to penetrate it. But if by this process you can convert this weight of debt into an instrument of credit, not only for those interested in it, but for a great portion of the community, and also for the Government to an almost unlimited extent; and at the same time restore the circulation of the money medium to its accustomed action, you have accomplished great and essential purposes. It is for these purposes that this bill was reported, and the amount named in it fixed upon for the capital of a National Bank, that it might absorb such a mass of the encumbering stock as would relieve the market; raise the price of debt not taken up; give facilities to the obtaining of loans for the present year, and for each succeeding year. And here I would beg leave to remark, that an evident repugnance has been manifested by some gentlemen (which I will not, however, impute to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina) to doing anything to raise the price of public stock, lest those who have purchased at a low rate should be benefitted. Permit me to inquire of those who have no gratitude nor feeling for public creditors, who have loaned you their money in the time of your necessity; will you refrain from doing an act indispensably necessary for the credit of the Government, and to enable it to borrow more money, for fear you do a benefit, not to call it an act of justice, to your creditors? I would ask such gentlemen how they expect to go into the market and sell stock for eighty-eight, when that already sold is every day to be bought for eighty? It is humiliating to dwell upon a subject so plain and simple, and but for the strange declarations which I have heard, it would not have been noticed. Mr. Chairman, there is no consideration which every financier who is obliged to anticipate his resources by loans is more attentive to than that of supporting public credit; or, in other words, keeping up the price of stocks. The faithful payment of interest, though indispensable, is not always sufficient. Sinking funds have therefore been resorted to, but as your power of establishing sinking funds is limited, when we find by a repetition of loans we have overloaded the market, you must if possible withdraw that surplusage before you can recommence your loaning operations, and even then you must return to the market with that caution which experience has indicated, as necessary to your success. It is therefore, that we propose to take out of the market the eighteen millions of stock, and the six millions of Treasury notes; and, as the stocks are now selling at eighty, it was calculated that an advance of twenty-five per cent. upon $24,000,000, equalized as it would be upon the whole amount of the debt in which subscriptions to the bank could be made, (about eighty millions,) might be computed to advance the whole of these depressed stocks to about eighty-eight; the sum proposed to be absorbed, therefore, was the least amount that could, consistent with the plan, have been taken. But there is another reason why a large capital was determined upon; we prepare, for the sake of mutual benefits to the bank and the Government, to give it great facilities in the circulation of its notes. In fact, this will be almost the only medium which can be employed for the payment of taxes, or to carry on the ordinary commercial intercourse between people of different States, those of most of the State banks being now exclusively confined to a circumscribed atmosphere around the bank from which they issued. With these facilities, it is apparent that the bank may issue considerable quantities of paper, and it was much safer to make the capital of the bank exceed the amount of notes which the demand for circulating medium would enable it to issue, than that it should have power to contract debts equal to its capital. And here it should be observed, that a bank with a small capital, possessing in all other respects the same facilities with a bank with a large capital—specie payments being suspended—will be able to issue nearly, if not exactly, the same quantity of paper. It therefore becomes necessary for the security of the creditors of such a bank that it should have a large capital. I heard the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) with some degree of astonishment, yesterday state, that a bank of one million of dollars could with safety issue paper to the amount of two or three millions. I would ask him what would be the situation of an individual whose debts three times exceed his whole real and personal estate? He would be insolvent, and so would the bank. No bank conducted with integrity ever did issue notes to the amount of its capital; and no bank that has any regard to its reputation will ever dare to do it. The gentleman has probably confounded discounts and emission together; an error into which many others have been led before him. Although these operations are intimately connected, yet they are extremely different in their nature; the one constitutes the debts due to the bank while the other constitutes the debts due by the bank. The gentleman and every member of the Committee will see the distinction, and it will be unnecessary further to illustrate it. I think it has been sufficiently shown that a bank, with a capital much less than fifty millions, could not with safety issue upon the customary mode of bank operation notes to meet the present demands for a circulating medium and preserve an adequate security to its creditors. It is I believe unusual for the large State banks to issue in paper more than one third or, at most, one-half the amount of their capital, although they often loan or discount to the whole amount.

The next point which presents for consideration is the character of the capital; it is proposed to be constituted of twenty-four millions of public debt that have accrued since March, 1812, or that is now authorized to be created; $18,000,000 of this will be six per cent. stock, and $6,000,000 in Treasury notes now issued or to be issued in pursuance of existing laws; twenty millions to be subscribed by the Government and paid in six per cent. stock, and six millions in specie. The objections that have been urged to the character of this capital are worthy of some particular notice. We are told "that it is nothing more than a paper bank," that it is not entitled to credit; that "its paper will not circulate, having no security for its solvency but the obligation of the Government to pay its debts." It is perhaps fortunate for the friends of this bill that they have the light of experience to justify their expectations and calculations on this subject. Is there not a strong resemblance between the character of this capital and that of the old United States

H. OF R.

Bank? The amount and proportions are somewhat variant, but the essentials are precisely the same, and when was the validity of that paper questioned? It is true specie payments were not suspended, but everybody knew that while it was doing business upon a capital of ten millions of dollars, issuing notes to the amount of five to six millions, its specie capital only amounted to $2,500,000, and no difficulties were ever experienced for want of more specie than I have heard of. In ordinary times, there is very little occasion for specie in banking operations; none is wanted except for the payment of balances between the merchants of different cities, between different banks, and the small change required by retailers; and the amount of specie required for these purposes does not increase in proportion to the amount of banking capital employed in the country. As an evidence of this fact we may refer to the operations performed by the Bank of England. The amount of payments made every day by the different banks of London, is estimated to exceed four millions sterling; and in the year 1810, the whole amount of notes of the Bank of England, and private banks, in circulation amounted to seventy-nine millions sterling, while the specie only amounted to four millions. It may be fairly inferred that the credit of a bank does not depend upon the amount of specie in its vaults, no more than the credit of a merchant depends upon the amount of money he keeps in his desk; his visible estate, his income and his integrity are the foundation of his credit, and it is the same with the bank; the visible estate of which is the public debt and specie, its income is the interest arising therefrom, and from loans to Government and individuals; and the caution that will be exercised in the selection of directors, will no doubt, as has almost universally been the case, especially in the large banks, insure a faithful and judicious management of its affairs. But, we are told the only security for its paper is the obligation of the Government to pay its debts. And are we to be gravely told that this is no security? I never can for a moment believe that this security will be questioned, regarding, as every man in the nation does, the obligations of the Government to its creditors of so solemn and unchangeable a character that, let whatever may happen, they must be fulfilled in good faith. In addition to these considerations, the credit which the paper of the bank will receive in payment of taxes and customs, and the imperious necessity which exists for a circulating medium that will be co-extensive with the States, will insure the circulation of the paper, and there cannot exist a rational doubt of its credit being maintained without depreciation, answering all the valuable purposes that are expected from it both for the Government and the community. But here we are met by another objection, viz: that the enormous loan, as it has been called, of thirty millions, to be made to the Government, will produce a run on the bank that will exhaust all its specie and arrest its future operations. In the first place, it is not to be presumed that the Government will do any act that will embarrass the bank, being as it always must be so deeply interested in its preservation. The loan will therefore be asked for according to the terms of the bill, in such sums and at such periods as may be made mutually convenient and consistent with the objects of the Government; and there is no doubt the Government would regard this resource as a reserve only to be used in time of particular necessity, when the depression of stocks should forbid them from going at large into the market. At any rate the amount would not be required, as it could not be wanted in large sums; and such of these as would be drawn out of the bank, would mostly find their way into it again before another payment would be demanded; a portion would return in taxes, and other portions in payment of debts due from the country to the city merchants, and a very considerable part of this loan would, like ordinary loans or discounts as they are called, to individuals, never get from the drawer of the bank, but merely pass from the credit to the debtor side of its books. Under this view of the subject, which exhibits the necessary and natural operations, it will be admitted that not so much danger exists from this loan as some gentlemen seem to apprehend; but should any unexpected difficulties menace the bank, there will be a resort to the power of suspending specie payments. But this provision has also been objected to, and almost in the same breath we are told that no bank can exist with the extensive operations designed for this, with an obligation to make specie payments—but objectors have not furnished us with an alternative. I do not apprehend any serious consequence will result from the temporary suspension of specie payments; the experiment was tried many years ago in England, and has been continued up to this time without injury to the commercial interests, and with essential benefit to the nation at large. It has also been tried here, and although bank paper is somewhat depreciated thereby, it is solely because it will not answer the purpose of paying balances between people of different States, for which specie had usually been employed. For example, the bank paper of this District will not enable you to trade east of Baltimore; yet every article to be purchased with it here is as cheap as it was twelve months ago. It may therefore be fairly inferred, that a paper which was receivable all over the United States, in taxes, and might be exchanged for notes of smaller or greater denomination or Treasury notes in each of the States, would, from its general convenience, continue to circulate without depreciation, even though a temporary suspension of specie payments should take place. It has already been shown that but a small quantity of specie is actually necessary, when the people have faith in the capital, the income, and the integrity of the bank, and in this case necessity would become an auxiliary to faith, and business would go on as usual. But further: is it not probable that most of the moneyed capitalists in the United States would vest a portion of their disposable funds in this bank, as also a number of the State banks, and will not all these be interested in the support of the credit of its paper? I do not believe it possible for any hostile combination to resist their influence in money transactions, when thus united and thus interested; and, from every view that can be taken of the subject, there does not appear any rational doubt of the success of the plan proposed by the committee in answering all the valuable purposes for which it was designed. But further: the plan has been for a considerable time before the public, and although some have objected to the amount of the specie called for by the bill, as being difficult to procure and unnecessary, it has met the approbation of the most intelligent men in this community, (as to money matters I mean;) to say nothing of the mature and deliberate consideration which has been given to it by the able and enlightened statesman at the head of the Treasury Department, who, relying upon the support of Congress, has assumed the high responsibility of his station with a degree of energy and confidence that does no less honor to himself than it promises to do service to the country; to say nothing of the discussion and consideration which has been given to this subject by the Committee of Ways and Means, for whom although no more confidence should be claimed than for any like number of the members of the House, yet their duty, their great responsibility, could not fail to produce a laborious examination of the plan. But we are not without experience as to its influence. The stocks had begun to advance, of course public credit was reviving, and some loans were actually negotiating for the relief of the present quarter, in anticipation of the success of this bill to carry into effect the general plan of finance submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury. Such was the progress of our fiscal operations, and we were emerging, as it were, from a dense cloud of difficulties and embarrassments that hung over the nation. A more extensive and efficient system of finance than any ever adopted in this country, was progressing to maturity as rapidly as circumstances would admit; and the bill under consideration, an indispensable instrument to carry it into effect, had progressed with a flattering prospect of success; and behold! at a crisis so eventful, we are met by a proposition which goes (to use the expression of the gentleman from South Carolina) to effect a radical change in the whole system of the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. I shall say nothing farther as to the time and manner of this proposition; but I trust it will appear to have been suggested without due consideration, as it has been without concert or consultation; and, however plausible in theory, that it is impracticable in its details and will be injurious in its effects.

In attempting to investigate this new plan, we are subjected to considerable difficulties on the threshold, because it has neither assumed form nor shape. The plan can therefore only be collected from the suggestion of the honorable gentleman in his speech yesterday, except so far as it is found in the amendment on the table, which only appears to be a small patch of the scheme.

That the scheme is crude and undigested, there can be little doubt, when we recollect the changes that have been proposed or consented to by the mover since it made its appearance in the Committee yesterday; but I will proceed to examine it. The plan proposes to constitute the bank upon a basis of six millions of specie and forty-four millions of Treasury notes; these notes hereafter to be issued, and when subscribed to the bank to be exchanged for six per cent. stock at par; fifteen millions of the forty-four to be placed in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. And to carry the plan into effect, a law must be passed to authorize the issuing of the Treasury notes, and another law to dispose of the fifteen millions in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund; and, as there may be a great difference of opinion as to these ulterior measures between the branches of Congress, the possibility of a failure to pass these laws presents a strong objection to the plan. We already find a difference of opinion between the two gentlemen from South Carolina who have supported the amendment; one of them (Mr. Lowndes) altogether disapproves of placing fifteen millions of notes in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be exchanged for six per cent. stock and subscribed to the bank. I shall presently consider this part of the subject, with reference to both of their schemes, and in the mean time recur to the proposition to issue either the forty four or the twenty-nine millions of Treasury notes, for the purpose of being subscribed to the bank; and it may here be observed, that the Treasury notes are not, as some seem to think, calculated for a circulating medium, nor can they ever be made to supply its place; it is an evidence of debt bearing interest, in no essential particular different from the public stock, except that the former is made payable monthly at the end of a year, while the latter are redeemable at a longer period; the interest that accrues retards, instead of accelerating the circulation, and it must partake of all the essential qualities of capital. If, therefore, you issue a sum of Treasury notes, you make virtually a loan to that amount, and especially if they are not to be repaid, as in the present case, at the end of the year; the money market is as much exhausted by the operation as if six per cent. stock is sold to the same amount. It is therefore fair to consider this enormous emission of Treasury notes as a loan, which, by offering extraordinary inducements, you calculate to effect. Now, in order to judge of the propriety of this measure at this time, we must consider the state of the money market, and also what constitutes the capacity of a people to loan to their Government. It has already been observed that the market is overcharged with stocks, and each succeeding loan has (except in one instance) been obtained on more unfavorable terms than the former. It must be evident, therefore, that we have attempted to borrow, and that we have borrowed too much in proportion to the provisions that have been made to redeem, especially when we consider the stagnation of the medium. The stock market is glutted and overloaded, and you may buy stocks in it at a much cheaper rate than the Government ought to sell them. Is it then prudent or wise to force out at such a time, in one year, the enormous sum of forty-four millions of new stock to accumulate this now insupportable burden on the market? It should be recollected that the amount which the people can loan to their Government, within a given time, can never exceed the amount of their net profits for the same time; and in a country like this, where there are so many avenues to wealth by the reinvestment of the yearly profits in capital, either by enlarging existing establishments, or engaging in new employments, it cannot be expected that any very considerable portion of the annual profits can be borrowed, without giving a high premium for them. But at this particular time, owing to the interruption of all business by the stoppage of specie payments by the banks, and the consequent location of their paper to a very limited boundary, it cannot be expected that the habits of industry or means of loaning can be near as great as they will be when the circulating medium of the country shall resume its accustomed activity. If these premises are correct, the conclusion is inevitable, that it would not only be unwise and impolitic to press so great a loan as it were by force upon the market at this time, but that it would be much more safe and prudent to withdraw a part of the stocks from the market, and abstain if possible from pressing it again until it shall have become relieved by the income of the succeeding year. Hence it is that we propose to require the bank to loan money to the Government, a part of which would perhaps be required for the next year, and the remainder reserved for similar exigencies. But the honorable gentleman from South Carolina calculates to obviate all difficulties and embarrassments for two years, by the sale of the twenty-nine or the forty-four millions of Treasury notes, which he calculates will readily be sold at par, nay, even at a premium. Now, as the amendment stood when he delivered his speech, and as it now stands (although I am aware of the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky to require payment for the bank subscription to be made in Treasury notes only, to the amount of forty-four millions, which he had thought proper, however, on reflection to withdraw, and which upon more mature reflection, I am sure I will not renew)—as the amendment now stands, the payments may be made in Treasury notes or gold and silver. And how will Treasury notes be sold for specie or bank notes of equal value, at a premium or at par, when the specie can be paid directly into the bank? The thing is too absurd to dwell upon for a moment. But perhaps we shall be told that the subscriptions for the forty-four millions must be paid in Treasury notes only. I can hardly think it possible that the honorable gentleman, with all his courage, would venture upon such a measure to force his Treasury notes into the market; it would be little better than a tender law in principle, and in its operation most iniquitous, and injurious to the success of his plan. For instance, an individual being in possession of specie must be compelled to buy Treasury notes before he can subscribe to the bank—thus preventing specie from finding its way into bank, which must always continue its specie payments, and he must be subjected to the risk of not being able to secure the amount of his subscription to the bank; in which case there will no doubt be a loss upon the Treasury notes that are not absorbed, and of course the less inducement to buy them. But it does not appear to me that the Treasury notes can be sold to the amount proposed. How are they to be paid for? Specie cannot be found: will you sell them for bank notes? One-half of these, if the Treasury notes are distributed over the States for sale, as the gentleman proposes, will answer the Government no purpose. It has now near three millions of Southern notes, which cannot be applied to the payment of the interest on the public debt in Boston—nor can the notes of Baltimore be certainly applied to the payment of debts even in Philadelphia. How then can these forty-four millions of Treasury notes be sold for a valuable consideration in any State where the taxes exceed the disbursements of the Government, and in which the banks do not pay specie? The gentlemen of this House may, perhaps, take a few of their per diems home in Treasury notes, but it will be impossible to distribute them when the credit of the Government exceeds its debts, unless you give them away. But the gentleman proposes to reduce the denomination—and what will this avail his plan? A few of them may be picked up by hucksters and tin-peddlers, and there it will end. You cannot pay money where you do not owe it, nor sell Treasury notes to people who have no money to buy them with, or whose money answers you no purpose. I conclude, thus far, that the scheme is unwise, impolitic and impracticable.

But suppose it were possible to carry it into effect, what is its moral character and its effect upon public credit? I do not mean to impeach the motives or moral principles of the honorable gentlemen who have advocated this plan of a bank. I know they are utterly incapable of supporting any measure of which they entertain a doubt as to its strict moral propriety; but, thinking differently from them in this particular, I shall be excused for explaining my views of it. It has already been stated that the stocks are in a state of heavy depression; and, it may be added, that those who have given you one hundred dollars in specie for one hundred dollars in stock, cannot now sell the same for more than eighty dollars; so of those who have given you eighty-eight for one hundred. This depression is not the fault of the creditor; it is his misfortune; and when the Government can, without injury to itself, either do a benefit to its creditors thus circumstanced, or avoid doing them an injury, it is bound by every moral obligation so to do. But what will be the effect of the measure under consideration? We find the stock market glutted; the public creditor sinking under his burdens, and, without any occasion whatever, we accumulate an additional mass upon him and consum-mate his ruin. But, says the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) fifteen million of Treasury notes shall be applied to purchase up the depressed stocks—that is, he will offer seventy-five or eighty dollars in Treasury notes for a certificate, which purports, on its face, to demand one hundred dollars in specie. But this is not all; by our own act we first depress the price and depreciate the value of our debt, and then, by the aid of some speculating scheme, we buy up that debt at its depreciated rates, just like some swindling traders in our cities, who, when their credit is exhausted, shut up shop, and send out runners to buy up their notes at forty or fifty per cent. discount. Such is, to my mind, the character of the transaction. But one honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEYER,) is opposed to this part of the plan; he will not employ any part of the intended capital of this bank to purchase up the depressed stocks. So much the worse. The public creditor would then have no remedy for even a part of his misfortunes, and the Government, in such a case, would act the part of a spendthrift whose land could not be sold for debt, and while he was giving usurious advantages to obtain new credit, he would defy his old ones, and mock at their complaints. I am aware that many plausible things may be said to show what are the obligations of the Government to its creditors, and that they may be fulfilled according to the terms of the contract without being noticed in this bill. Be it so; but I contend that you are attempting to effect by indirect means, what you would not venture to do by direct means—that is, to obtain from the public creditor your obligation for a less amount than you promise upon the face of it to pay him. He will not be satisfied with special pleadings and logie; he will realize his misfortunes and execrate his wrong-doers. When his children cry for bread, his answer will be, I loaned to my country; I confided in her justice; but, in an unlucky hour, her councils were guided by logicians, and I am ruined. But there is another feature in the new plan which constitutes an insuperable objection. Specie payments are to be made absolute. If we did not know that necessity sometimes requires a suspension of specie payments by banks both at home and abroad, and that it may be done without that terrible danger which some affect to apprehend, there would be some reason to refuse making any provision for the case; but with all this light, and the existing condition of the specie medium of the country in full view before us, it would seem to be a species of frantic enthusiasm not to provide for the case. If bank credit can be restored, and it has not been essentially impaired, there will be a better opportunity to do it under the power to suspend the specie payments, guarded as it is, than there would be in any other way. But suppose the balance of trade to continue strongly against us, and a high premium for specie to be given by our enemy. Your bank will become an instrument by which it will be driven from the country; and it may happen, and probably will happen, that their specie payments cannot be discontinued—and what will then be the situation of the bank? Failing to fulfil the purposes designed, its credit is blighted, its operations are stopped, and its charter violated; and if this should take place before your Treasury notes are sold, the Government will scarce obtain a moment's relief; but if the Treasury notes have been forced out, will they not come back upon the Government for payment when it has no means to redeem them, instead of passing into the drawer of a broken bank?

The patience of the Committee is no doubt exhausted, and I will conclude by exhibiting the relative pecuniary value of the two plans, in a calculation that cannot be misunderstood.

By the scheme of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, suppose that you succeed in issuing the forty-four millions of dollars in Treasury notes at par, whether to be vested in stock or for the purpose of a direct subscription into the bank, and suppose, too, that the fifteen millions of Treasury notes will purchase one hundred dollars of stock for eighty dollars of notes—the advance or profit obtained in the operation will be the difference between the present price that is paid for money and the rate thus obtained, viz: twenty-five per cent., which, upon forty-four millions, will be eleven millions. This is the utmost that can be claimed for his plan, if it succeeds.

Now, by the plan proposed by the bill, we have the same advance upon six millions of Treasury notes, viz:

Twenty-five per cent. upon a loan of thirty millions	$1,500,000

And, if we suppose our bank stock to advance twenty per cent. above par,	7,500,000

it will make a disposable capital of $25,000,000, to obtain which we should be obliged at the present rates to pay a premium of $6,250,000	6,250,000

Which, together with the advance on the stock	5,000,000

Will make a net gain to the Government of	20,250,000

Making a difference in favor of the Government, by the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and
Means of	$9,250,000

This is a plain arithmetical fact, that cannot be controverted. The figures will speak for themselves, and every member of the Committee may make the calculations for himself. But I can scarcely hope to convince the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. He appears to be so enthusiastically attached to his proposition, that he has called in the aid of his prophetic spirit to sustain him, and has painted in glowing colors the prospect of the blockade being raised, and the speedy restoration of our foreign commerce and coasting trade to their accustomed activity. But I cannot rely upon anticipations of this kind, though I have often listened with pleasure to them. I have heard of his prophecies before, and recollect listening with pleasure, though with some degree of scepticism, to a speech of his, highly colored with promising prospects, on a bill which has contributed to produce, more than any other cause, our present fiscal embarrassments. It does appear to me that the wisest course would be not to yield to visionary speculations, nor to adapt our measures to a state of things not likely to be realized. We have been trying expedients too long. Solid, substantial, and lasting measures are now indispensable. Such is the character of the proposition contained in the bill, while the amendment proposed totally changes its character as well as form. That which was designed as an agent to revive public credit, to supply the present exigence of the country, and give such facility in obtaining future loans as would enable us to prosecute this war with vigor and effect, is to be converted into a machine to squeeze a little depreciated money out of the people for the present—abandoning the other great and important objects, so indispensably necessary to be effected.

I beg pardon of the Committee for having trespassed so long upon their patience, and the only apology that can be offered is the importance of the subject.

Mr. INGERSOLL said that he inserted himself into this debate with great reluctance; almost in despair—reluctance to take part in a discussion for which he had no inclination, and which he thought had better be left to the members of the committee who had reported the bill—in despair, because he had no hope of making any impression on an assembly but too studious of change, too fond of novelty, too apt to think that national wealth was most certainly to be found in individual impoverishment. Ever since this war was declared, and, indeed, since the session of Congress preceding it, the nation had been kept alive on sickly hopes of peace and the empirical sustenance of inadequate loans; and it was not till just now, when these flattering unctions were no longer applicable, that we had made up our minds to the solid food of heavy taxes, pledges of them in sinking funds, and a national banking institution. For his part, Mr. I. said, he had uniformly denied and deprecated the effects anticipated from the Russian mediation, as well as those of the negotiation subsequently translated from Gottenburg to Ghent. These always appeared to him to be the beau ideal of our Foreign Relations. He had never ceased to remonstrate against abstracting an eminent person from the head of the Treasury Department, to send him to make the grand tour of Europe in pursuit of peace. I have invariably thought and said, said Mr. I., that the only policy was that just indicated by my friend and colleague, who preceded me, (Mr. INGHAM) to look the difficulties manfully in the face, conceive them at their worst, and deal with them accordingly. We have at last come to this complexion, and I congratulate the country on the occasion. We never should have had peace until war was waged in earnest; and, perhaps, we are now much nearer to a termination of hostilities than we were while subsisting on pacific overtures.

The Treasury Department, in concert, and after long consideration with the Committee of Ways and Means, assuming the responsibility of their respective stations, have recommended to us the plan of a bank which is comprehended in the bill under discussion. In this Congress of Ambassadors (as I think it was the late President Adams, in his Treatise on the Constitution, very aptly denominates us,) rather than a Congress of the Representatives of different portions of the same people, it should always be the first preliminary to entering upon any subject, the sine qua non—since sine qua non are so much the mode in modern Congresses—to agree, by mutual sacrifices of pride of opinion and the spirit of system, to endeavor to attain some practicable object and result. It is well known to every member that a National Bank, while nearly all acknowledge the imperious necessity of such an establishment, has to encounter the various obstacles and collisions which arise from various quarters of this House. In the first place, it is to be opposed by the gentlemen on the opposite side, who, deeming the war unjust in its origin, deem it, moreover, a Constitutional and correct orbit of opposition to move indiscriminately against every measure calculated to act in furtherance of the war. I will not take upon myself to determine whether this is a proper view of the subject. We, at all events, know that it is one most steadfastly adhered to. In the next place, a bank is resisted by certain scruples respecting the Constitutional power of Congress to create one, which obtain with several gentlemen on this side of the House. And lastly, it cannot be doubted but that the most powerful, pervading, and indefatigable hostility out of doors will be organized by the innumerable State banking institutions, which comprehend within the sphere of their influence almost every man of property in the country, who may apprehend that a Bank of the United States would tend to curtail, to cripple, or to destroy their resources. As long, however, as the objections urged on this floor were confined to those which might have been expected, and which may be urged against all such establishments, I did not suppose it incumbent on any member to assist those gentlemen of the committee who have the particular conveyance of this bill through the House. I should not have presumed, therefore, to mingle in the debate in reply to such objections. Indeed, the grounds which were eloquently occupied by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Gaston) seemed to me to be sufficiently answered by himself, for I really think that there were few of the difficulties which he recapitulated against the proposed plan that are not in equal force of existence against the substitute he suggested. As to plans, indeed, I am not, myself, at all tenacious. Any plan will answer my purposes that promises to restore public credit and create a circulating medium. Nor can we, to be sure, complain of any deficiency of projects. Almost every gentleman has his own; and, if you happen to look into a newspaper, ecce homo! here is a daily column of most comfortable schemes, already printed for your perusal. [In allusion to a voluminous writer on these subjects in the National Intelligencer, who affixed the signature of "Homo" to his essays.] It affords me pleasure to bear testimony to the satisfaction with which I followed the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) in the development of his substitute for the system recommended by the Treasury Department. I must do that gentleman the justice to say that his views were exhibited in a clear, connected, and well-digested discourse on this abstruse and complicated subject, in which he unquestionably showed, at least, his own preparation and capacity for explaining and supporting any favorite project he may choose to introduce; and, while I declare my unequivocal opinion that his appears to me to be the most fantastic, impracticable, and, I will add, pernicious of all the plans we could adopt, calculated inevitably to destroy the public credit of this Government—to damn it to all eternity—yet, so anxious am I to provide for the crisis which presses on us, that I would rather fall in even with this alternative, at the expense of all your remaining public credit, in preference to not voting for some immediate means for meeting present embarrassments. If we must ruin our existing creditors in order to procure fresh supplies, and if that is the best manner of procuring them, I profess my readiness to proceed to so deplorable a resort, rather than to omit altogether the making of some provision for the exigency. But the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has pointed out to us a stream of finance which positively is not navigable. We may trace its origin and follow its course—seemingly a fine volume of water, fertilizing as it flows—until we behold it emptying itself into the ocean; but when we come to try its usefulness, we find that, like the river Susquehanna, its navigation is doubtful, dangerous, and unsafe. It invites population to settle on its shores, but diseases and death infest them; and we are amazed to discover, on experiment, how fatally it disappoints the expectations that were at first encouraged of its beneficial properties. Nothing but a freshet will justify our venturing on this current; and that is precarious, uncertain, and alarming.

Let us examine this unexpected substitute. What do we find? Why, sir, in the outset, an insuperable difficulty, in limine, before we reach the body of the project. The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who, no doubt, in the zeal of an ardent mind, let drop some rather inadmissible expressions by way of forestalling the objections he anticipated to his scheme, will excuse me for the similitude; but really it reminds me of the French veterinary surgeon, who killed the sick horse, in order that he might prove his skill by restoring him to life. Is it not so? Does not his plan demand, as its first postulate, a total prostration of the public means, an absolute vacuum in the Treasury, to be afterwards revived by filling it with forty millions of Treasury notes? Does it not require that the twelve millions which are indispensable for the current quarter of this year, should be sacrificed, and that the Government should stop payment for the present, relying on this scheme for obtaining funds hereafter? Most assuredly the doors to which you look for loans will be locked up and double-bolted against your advances, if you enact a law, impregnated as this is now proposed to be with injustice to those who have hitherto sustained your credit by administering to your occasions. You are to forego the advantages of an approved and rational plan, you are to abandon the attempt to borrow what you stand most seriously in need of at the present moment, you are to stop payment, you are to become bankrupt, in order that new, untried, and impracticable efforts may afterwards be made to raise you from the grave. The thing is impossible; and if it were not, the experiment, at all events, is rather too critical a one. You may, I believe that you must, perish under the operation. Of how nice and delicate a texture public credit is composed, we have had demonstrations but too painful during the present session. It is the very gossamer of political elements. The perpetual sunshine of confidence is necessary to its existence. Withhold this, and it languishes. Withdraw it, and it dies. And once dead, where is the magic, where the power, that can revive it? Let me caution gentlemen against even handling it too roughly. It is but too easily destroyed; and, whatever may be said in speculations here, depend upon it, sir, that there is no skill in either surgery or quackery that can call it back again to an animation once suspended.

Such however, so imminent, so full of dissolution and decay, are the very foundations on which this new superstructure is to be built up. Let us now look a little further into its details. And here, at the very inside of the threshold, I am again struck with a general imperfection. Why not come at once to the rejected resolutions of my honest friend from Georgia? (Mr. HALL.) What use is there in such a mass of banking machinery to give circulation to some millions of Treasury notes? Why not issue them at once, without this unwieldy, this unnecessary medium? Do you surround them with it in order to pass them off with less embarrassment, supposing that the public will occupy themselves in examining the mill, without scrutinizing the material? If you do, disappointment will be the consequence; for those moneyed men whom you hitherto have looked to for support, though now you seem ready to discard them, are not to be so easily prevailed upon. They are a sharp-sighted animal, who will pierce through your projects at a glance, however you may wrap and fold them up from common observation.

Again: If Treasury notes are to constitute the universal succedaneum, and you intend to deprive the Government of authority to prohibit the issue of specie even under peculiar circumstances and for short periods, what occasion have you for any specie capital at all? Do you imagine, sir, that your five or six millions will be suffered to remain quietly in circulation, going in and out of the vaults of this bank, without any guard whatever against its fraudulent evasion? I am quite mistaken if the whole sum would not migrate to Halifax within a fortnight after its deposit. I cannot pretend to speak with precision as to the amount of specie, now in retirement, belonging to the different banks of Philadelphia, and individuals who have secured portions of it in safe places, but I should imagine that it must be considerable, perhaps some millions. How long is it supposed it would continue in fair circulation if the banks were to pay it out for notes? It would infallibly and almost instantaneously disappear. I confess that I have my doubts as to the propriety of affording Government any number of the directors of the bank. But I cannot conceive a mode for dispensing with the inhibition by law of specie issues in certain cases, without referring this authority for its exercise to the directors themselves, who must endanger the charter by its enforcement. It is, therefore, best in other hands. But after all, sir, it was in behalf of the public creditors that I was mainly induced to address you. It was to bespeak your indulgence; to appeal to your faith; to indicate your policy, as regards the stockholders of the late loans that I have ventured to rise on this occasion. In order to understand and appreciate their relation to the Government, let us inquire how it came about. It is not two years since, when I first came to this House, I felt it my duty to assert their pretensions against attack from the other side. And now already, much sooner, I confess, than I expected, I am called upon to defend them from attacks on this side. Blessed encouragement this, to be sure, for those who may be disposed to lend their money to the public. And, pray, what are the circumstances that justify these aggressions? You first went into the market for a loan of eleven millions at six per cent., of which you obtained but about six. [Here some explanations took place between Mr. EPPES, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and Mr. INGERSOLL, by which it appeared that Mr. I. was mistaken in supposing that the residue of this loan had been filled up by a diversion of the Sinking Fund for that purpose. Mr. E. pointedly denied that the Sinking Fund ever had been diverted from its true object.]

The explanation afforded by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) makes no change, (proceeded Mr. INGERSOLL) in the aspect of my argument. I was about to show that your loan market was exhausted by a loan of six or seven millions, at the hundred for a hundred. Your next bargain was for sixteen millions at eighty-eight for the hundred. Afterwards seven millions and a half at the same rate. And, finally, that portion of the twenty-five millions which has been negotiated at eighty, and perhaps less, for the hundred. And what inducements did you hold forth to those who advanced these sums? Of course the faith of Government for the punctual payment of the interest, and faithful redemption of the principal at the expiration of the stipulated term. But was this all? Was there no accessory, no additional inducement, besides the plighted faith of the nation? This House must well remember that there was. It cannot be forgotten that the Secretary of the Treasury was selected as one of the Commissioners to repair to Europe to treat for peace; and it is perfectly well known that both he and his colleague, at the time that some of these loans were under contract, were sanguine in their calculations on the prosperous result of their mission. Indeed, since we have become acquainted with their instructions, it cannot be matter of surprise that they should have entertained such a confidence. The fact, however, is, that subscribers to the loan at eighty-eight, were led to believe, and from the best authority, that their stock would enjoy all the benefits of peace within twelve months from the time of their subscription, and that instead of merely par for the eighty-eight which they loaned, they might reasonably calculate on a rise of ten or fifteen per cent. above the one hundred which they were promised for their money. It was, moreover, made a test of patriotism in the subscribers, and hundreds contributed in part on this principle. Gentlemen talk of these persons as if they were the veriest brokers and stockjobbers in the world; and as if, too, none but brokers and stockjobbers had subscribed. But no misconception could be more unfounded. Let such as imagine that some half a dozen usurious capitalists hold all the stock in question, attend on quarter day at the door of a bank in which dividends are payable, and examine there into the characters and conditions of the crowd of anxious expectants for their income. They will find the widow and the orphan, the aged and the infirm, as well as the wealthy and the competent, waiting for their shares—some of them for small sums, payable by way of annuity, (which was authorized by the loan laws,) and the only reliance of the poor people who have invested their funds in this stock. These are the persons whom you are proposing to cast aside. They did not seek you nor press themselves into your assistance. But, on the contrary, you went in search of them, and induced them, by strong and seductive promises, to part with their money for your necessities. They did so at your earnest instances. They paid it to you when they could have had gold and silver for their checks. But now, having bound them to your destiny, having exhausted their capacity to lend, you deny them (should the proposed amendment be adopted) any participation in your plans for the improvement of their funds. You leave them to their fate, vainly imagining that, after such crying injustice, you can substitute another class of creditors in their places. No moneyed institution can succeed which is to be founded on principles at war with the interests of the moneyed men of a community. You may rail at these persons if you will. But depend upon it, that to enlist their opposition to any plan for the restoration of public credit, is not the way to accomplish it.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

The bank contemplated by the original bill on the table was to be laid on the liberal, the politic, and the natural endowments of public stock and specie in certain adequate proportions. That which is to be attempted, should the amendment succeed, would, for the first time in the history of such institutions, be founded on a vast basis of new paper or stock to be created, to the prejudice of those who now own the stocks and regulate the prices, in the market. Of these, there are between sixty and eighty millions (including Treasury notes) in existence. Instead of withdrawing a third of this amount and appropriating it to a bank, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) would send in forty odd millions more, in the shape of Treasury notes, more heavily than ever to choke up and overdo the market. I do not pretend to be very conversant with these matters; but I must confess that I cannot perceive how such a scheme could possibly succeed in operation.

Of all models for a moneyed institution the late Bank of the United States affords one, the most worthy of imitation. And upon what was it founded? Public stock and specie capital. What public stock? Not new stock created for the purpose; but that which was funded at twenty shillings in the pound, though a great deal of it was purchased as low as one-and-sixpence. The Secretary of the Treasury would hear of no discrimination between the creditors. He well knew that public credit was to be created, not by looking forward to new auxiliaries, and discarding old ones, but by a punctilious and faithful, an indiscriminate and universal fulfilment of all former engagements. Paying old debts is the best mode of enabling a community to contract new ones. The Bank of England, the Bank of Genoa, most of the celebrated moneyed institutions in Europe, were established on similar recognitions and adoptions of the public stocks of their respective countries. The Bank of the United States therefore followed their example. Stockholders, who were known to have purchased their stock at a great discount, were nevertheless allowed to subscribe without discrimination, though it was well ascertained that the bank stock would immediately rise after the subscription, and though it did actually rise to one hundred and forty. Now, in all views of this subject, the late Bank of the United States affords a precedent to be consulted with the utmost consideration, and one not to be departed from without very sufficient causes. Broken up as that institution has been, and subjected to the severest tests of investigation, the wisdom, fidelity and punctuality of its transactions have been manifested in the strongest light; and I think it would be hazarding not a little to disregard them.

The gentlemen from South Carolina, both the honorable mover of this amendment (Mr. CALHOUN) and his colleague who supports him (Mr. LOWNDES,) deny that the creation of a new stock for the bank capital, would be either an injury or any injustice to the present stockholders. I understand that the stock was at eighty-one the day before yesterday in Baltimore, and looking up, in anticipation of its incorporation into the bank. No doubt it will fall again as soon as this proposition for excluding it goes abroad. What more infallible thermometer can we have of the effect of such a measure on the stock? There are between sixty and eighty millions of it in circulation. You propose to issue fifteen millions of Treasury notes for purchasing up such of it as is to be subscribed to the bank. The inevitable consequence must be, first a competition, a most unfair one, in the market, and then a depreciation of the stock. He who subscribed at eighty has twenty per cent. advantage over the more meritorious subscriber at one hundred or at eighty-eight, and no alternative is left for the latter but to sacrifice his stock at fifty or sixty, in order to reimburse himself by the profits of a subscription to the bank, or to hold his stock depreciated to one-half of what he gave for it. I am not disposed to repeat the epithets that were bestowed on such dealings by my friend and colleague, (Mr. INGHAM,) but really I must say that I should consider them most reprehensible proceedings. There is, too, a difference of from fifteen to twenty per cent. in the prices of stock at different places, at Baltimore and Boston, for instance, and the scandalous speculations to be authorized would therefore carry with them this additional aggravation. In fact, there is no stock market in this country; and, whenever the purchases in question are to be made, the holders of stock in different places must abide the effects of the variation in the prices accumulated on the other hardships of their case.

But why, we are asked, are these stockholders to be preferred? Why is an individual holding certificates of this stock to enjoy the advantages of a subscription to the Bank of the United States, in preference to any individual who does not happen to hold such certificates? The answer is, that they are not preferred any more than the few possessors of specie. Any person may buy the stock who chooses it, and thus become capacitated to subscribe it to the bank. There is no deficiency of it for sale in the market. We have taken care of that. And but too numerous, unfortunately, are they who are anxious to get rid of it.

As to taking it at the rate at which Government received their money, could anything be more unjust? The public faith was pledged to redeem eighty-eight with a hundred. The stockholders are consequently entitled, in the first place, to have one hundred for their eighty-eight; and then most assuredly they have a right, in common with all other subscribers, to all the profits to accrue, above par, on their subscription to the bank. In this they are not preferred to other subscribers; though perhaps it might be shown, without any great difficulty, that they are entitled to at least a highly favorable attention from the Government. We have got all their money. We took it when it was convertible into gold and silver. And it would be neither generous nor just now to postpone them to other members of the community.

These arguments, however, are controverted by the gentlemen from South Carolina, both of whom deny that Government is bound to admit these stockholders into the bank, as well as that any injury will be done to them by the exclusion. But what facts have they advanced to sustain their theory? The rise and fall of the stock is, as I have shown, a very clear criterion of the state of the stockholders' interests; and really I cannot help saying, that when so much experience and fact is to be overthrown by a speculation, we should have something more than even the most respectable opinions in its favor. One of those gentlemen (Mr. CALHOUN) insists that no depreciation can be the consequence of his scheme, and the other (Mr. LOWNDES) expressed his conviction that the proposed amendment is preferable to the original bill. Those honorable gentlemen know, I am well persuaded, of the attention and pleasure with which I always listen to whatever falls from either of them. But I must be pardoned for withholding my consent to this conclusion of theirs, which really is only asserted, not proved, by the one, with, if I may so express it, his most respectable colleague's endorsement on the draft.

I was surprised, I confess, at the latter gentleman's (Mr. LOWNDES) repetition of a question which had been previously put by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON.) Why, it is with seeming triumph demanded, why, if former and not new stock is to be part of the capital, do you exclude the old funded debt of the United States? Most obviously, it may be answered, because that account has long ago been settled; because a sinking fund has been many years operating the absorption of that debt; because it is not liable to the fluctuation of the market, as the late stock is, and because the holders of it do not desire you to meddle with it. [Mr. LOWNDES here inquired if Mr. INGERSOLL included the Louisiana stock, to which he answered that he did not.] The difference is very great indeed between the old six per cents., of which I am speaking, and the recent stocks created during the present war. After the experience public creditors have lately had of Congressional kindness and good will, they might well exclaim, like the French merchants to the economists: "Laissez nous faire." Let us alone. 'We do not stand in need of your assistance, nor desire your interposition. All that we ask is to be let alone.' Very different indeed is the situation of the new stockholders, with all their money gone, their funds depreciated, and their Representatives in Congress inveighing against their contracts as usurious and iniquitous. They are bound to the public ear by the ties they cannot break. They must continue to follow public fate. They cannot afford either to sell or to hold. After exhausting their credit at bank they are driven to the usurer for relief, who strips them of half their stock for the preservation of the residue—and that residue they must needs hold—to bequeath it to their children with curses on the Government which borrowed of them, on fair promises, to their last cent, and then left them to their ruin.

Mr. Chairman, we are debating this interesting subject under very peculiar circumstances. It is now two months since Congress have been in session, convened by the President under the pressure of great and weighty considerations. Since we assembled a most alarming temper has appeared in very decided indications among some of the Eastern States; and it is said to be intended, by the agitation of the Hartford Convention, to proceed deliberately to the disintegration of New England from the Union. For my part I cannot believe it. I cannot impute such designs to a people whose forecast, and orderly and general attachment to regular Government, have been so much vaunted, and, perhaps, not without reason. But what encouragement, if such be their object, are we not holding out to them? And what a rebuke the Hartford Convention may, in all probability, impose upon Congress! The fifteenth of December is advertised as the day of their meeting, scarcely more than three weeks from the moment when I address you—after having been two months in session, under every impulse to action and concert, without having yet achieved any one important act—without, in fact, being now as likely to agree as we were six weeks ago—still amusing ourselves with discordant projects and visionary speculations. The Hartford Convention will find disunion ready made to their occasions. Instead of taking steps to separate themselves from the other States, to delay or to defeat our measures, they will have, I fear, but too much opportunity for declaring that their Convention was rendered indispensable by our procrastination and idle controversy; that they met to save, not to destroy; not to deny the authority of Congress and prevent its proceedings, but to provide for our omissions; to raise an army to repel invasion; to create a navy; to establish adequate taxes and a circulating medium; to uphold the staggering credit of the country. We are disputing about details, while the nation is agonized with the pangs of dissolution. We must come to action, and that speedily, too, or the agony will be over. I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will be rejected, and that we shall endeavor to make some harmonious progress with the original bill on the table.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, in a powerful and impressive speech of an hour and a half, replied to the speeches of Messrs. INGHAM and INGERSOLL, and advocated the motion of Mr. CALHOUN. He began by deprecating a hasty decision on this subject, one of the most important that could ever come before a legislative body, being no less than the establishment of a charter for a moneyed institution of fifty millions, the features of which could not, when once settled by a solemn act of Congress, be changed, but must be as irrevocable, during the term of the charter, as the Constitution itself, &c. The National Bank, if necessary, was required by the public good alone. He, therefore, threw out of view, as wholly irrelevant, the argument in relation to the effect of the proposed amendment on the holders of public stock, who had no right to demand any advantages from such an institution, and to whom no injustice would be done by precluding them from any other share in it than other citizens of the United States. He stated some things in relation to this bill to show that the facts of its having been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means was not an unanswerable argument against amendment; for, he stated, that the principal feature proposed to be changed by this amendment scarcely obtained a majority in the Committee of Ways and Means, &c. He then proceeded to examine, first, the details of the bill before the House, and next of the amendment proposed to be made to it; and concluded an elaborate and able view of the subject, by expressing his decided conviction of the superior practicability of Mr. CALHOUN's proposition over the bill as reported, &c.

When Mr. OAKLEY concluded, at a little past 4 o'clock, the question was taken on Mr. CALHOUN's motion to amend the bill, and decided in the affirmative by a majority of about sixty votes. The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, November 18.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, remarked, that he looked upon the decision of the House, yesterday, as indicating a disposition on the part of the House to change the whole nature of the bill, now before a Committee of the Whole, for incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America. As many amendments in detail would be required, he thought the most proper way to act on the bill would be to recommit it, for amendment, to a select committee.

This motion was opposed by Mr. WRIGHT of Maryland, and Mr. LOWNDES of South Carolina, on the ground that there were parts of the plan of the gentleman, against which the House might decide, and which could as well be acted on in Committee of the Whole as by a select committee.

Mr. CALHOUN then withdrew his motion, reserving the right to offer it again, when further progress should have been made in the discussion of the bill.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, moved an amendment to the second section of the bill, (as it has been amended,) the object of which was, to admit the forty-four millions of the capital to be paid in Treasury notes, as it now stands, or in public stock created since the war.

This motion was declared by the Chairman to be out of order, inasmuch as the Committee of the Whole had yesterday decided that no part of the payments of the subscriptions to the bank should be made in the manner proposed by the amendments.

Mr. FORSYTH was, in this decision, disposed for the present to waive his motion; but an appeal was taken by Mr. FISK, of New York, from the decision of the Chair on this point; which decision was affirmed by the Committee of the Whole, 75 to 39.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the third section of the bill, which contemplates the subscription by the United States of twenty millions in six per cent. stock to the capital of the bank.

This section Mr. CALHOUN moved to strike out of the bill.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia said, he hoped the section would not be struck out. He considered it important that the United States should hold a certain proportion of the stock of the bank, because he believed the privilege of so doing would be valuable to the Government. In the stock of the old Bank of the United States the Government had held a considerable portion of the stock, and the benefit derived from it had not been denied. It had been a matter of boast on the other side of the House, and the Republican Administration had enjoyed the advantages arising to the Government from it. He could not conceive any solid objection to this course. It might be said the bank would be injuriously affected by the shares the United States would hold in it, because they would subscribe nothing but stock. But, Mr. F. said, if the basis of the bank was to be public stock, its value would not be destroyed by a part of it being owned by the United States as well as by individuals. He hoped the motion would not prevail.

Mr. CALHOUN said, the principle of his motion had been decided by the amendment which had been made to the second section. Consistency required that the House, after deciding as they did yesterday, should now strike out this section.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he did not consider the decision of yesterday as at all interfering with this motion. If it did, he felt himself to be committed contrary to his intention. The discussion on yesterday had not turned on this point; and, he contended, even had the House inadvertently decided the principle yesterday, the decision to retain this section would control the provision in the said second section, inasmuch as in law posterior control prior provisions. The Government ought, he contended, to have a share in the stock and in the direction of the bank. The old Bank of the United States would yet have been in operation, he said, if a portion of the direction had been under the control of the Government, to have prevented it from being a perfect inquisition. He instanced the advantages which several of the States derive from holding a share in the stock and a direction of banks within their respective limits. Seven-eighths of the capital of the bank, had, he said, been held by foreigners; and every man who had any hand in the direction of its concerns was adverse to the politics of this Administration. Some of them were refugees from the country, who ought to have been hung during the Revolution. It could not, therefore, be expected that Congress would revive that institution or create any other, the whole weight of which would have been thrown in the opposite scale to that of the United States. Mr. W. was desirous not only that the United States but that the agricultural interest of the country should hold a due proportion in the stock of this bank, to keep it out of the exclusive control of the commercial class, which he intimated was generally in the British interest, and not a few actually connected in business with British houses. The landed and manufacturing interest, he agued, ought to be at least equally interested in the bank with the commercial. It was necessary the Government should hold both stock and direction in the bank, to guard the United States against the operation of any foreign influence, &c.

Mr. CALHOUN, finding, as he said, from the course of the debate, that the eyes of the Committee had been so entirely directed to the main object of the amendment adopted yesterday, that they had overlooked the part of it to which this section had reference, rose to explain the reasons of his present motion. Whether the provision now under consideration should be struck out or retained, he contended, depended on the situation of the nation. He was clearly of opinion, that, in the present situation of the nation, it ought to be struck out. One great object of this bank was to afford the means of relieving the nation from difficulties under which it now labored. By striking out this section, the Government would not, he said, lose the advantages it would derive from retaining it, inasmuch as the twenty millions, instead of being vested by the United States in stock, would assume the shape of Treasury notes, and in reality produce the effect, by their absorption in the bank, of an immediate loan to the Government. Which, he asked, does the United States now most want, a capital or the use of a capital? He said he should be glad, indeed, abstractedly, that the United States should possess a share in the capital of the bank; he should be glad the United States should possess a capital in the bank on which they could draw one, two, or three per cent. more interest than they had to pay for it. But we want still more the use of the capital. If any gentleman could conceive the situation of the country to be such that we could lock up instead of using these twenty millions of capital, he would vote against this amendment. The capital, he said, would not be lost to the United States, but would assume for them the most active and most efficient form, by means of the Treasury notes, which, being put into circulation and absorbed by the Government, would effect an immediate loan to the Government. But, it had been said, unless the United States held some share in the bank, it would fall into the hands of our enemies. Mr. C. said, he did not think so harshly as the gentleman from Maryland of the commercial interest; in the large, he believed, that great interest to be American, notwithstanding some exceptions might be found to that character. But even if such a disposition as was feared by the gentleman should exist, it would not be controlled by retaining the present provisions of the bill, because the twenty directors could always vote down the five proposed to be appointed by the Executive, if there should arise a contest between the Government and the bank. But there was another means of protecting the Government against the bank, more potent and certain than any such provisions; let the United States retain the power over its deposits, and over the receipt of the bank notes in payment of duties and debts to the Government, and it would possess a sufficient control over the bank.

Mr. FORSYTH admitted an immediate loan would be an advantage to the Government; but was such a loan wanted, to the proposed amount, in addition to the taxes to be raised by the bills now before the House? He contended that it probably would not. But, if it would, he argued that part of the project was impracticable, because of the difficulty of throwing into market forty-four millions of dollars of Treasury notes; whereas, if twenty millions of that amount were subscribed in stock in behalf of the United States, the balance of twenty-four millions would be all disposed of, and would probably be sufficient for all the purposes of the Government. Even for the benefit of the gentleman's plan, therefore, this feature ought to be retained.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that if fifteen millions of the forty-four millions of Treasury notes were applied, as he had suggested, to the purchase of stock, and five millions to the redemption of Treasury notes falling due at the commencement of the next year, there would be no difficulty in disposing of the remainder of them. He said, to vest twenty millions in the capital stock of the bank would be acting like a man without a dollar in his pocket offering to lend out money at an interest lower than he has to pay for it for his use. If the demands of the Treasury during the next year did not require the whole of these notes, Mr. C. said, a part could be retained until the year after, and thus provision be made for two years. If the subscriptions were received monthly, in twelve instalments, there would never be out at one time more than two millions, much less than the amount of Treasury notes now in circulation. There would be no doubt, he thought, of their being sought for with avidity.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, said that, if the whole amount of Treasury notes now proposed to be issued should not be wanted in the course of the next year, it would unquestionably be more to the interest of the Government to invest twenty millions of the amount in stock in the bank, provided it would be an advantage to them to possess that stock. Allowing the stock of the bank to advance as it might be expected to do, it would afford a profit to the United States, in twelve months, of six millions of dollars; and the United States would, besides, dispose of the capital stock at its full value whenever they chose.

Mr. FORSYTH still questioned the ability to circulate so large an amount of Treasury notes; because they were not like bank paper, which could at any time command specie; nor would they circulate even as well as the present Treasury notes, because not payable at the end of the year, but to be funded in six per cent. stock. The fact that money is not to be paid for the proposed issue of Treasury notes, would be as well known to the people of the United States as this House. The circulation of Treasury notes at present was principally among those who have money on hand for which they have not immediate use, which they invest in Treasury notes in preference to this public stock; because, at the same time that they produce an interest, they are payable at a day certain. The Treasury notes to be issued will not suit such persons, and will therefore probably have a very limited circulation.

Mr. KILBOURN said he had voted for the amendment yesterday, without any idea that the other amendments indicated by its mover would necessarily follow. He hoped the section now under consideration would not be struck out. For, though he had ever believed the establishment of a National Bank one of the most important objects, yet, if this motion prevailed, he should greatly deprecate it. Was it true, he asked, that this nation was so embarrassed in its finances, was in such a critical situation, that to obtain money for a year it was necessary to establish a colossal moneyed institution, with a charter which it would be beyond the power of this Government to alter for twenty years; that might, in one year, if amended as proposed, fall entirely under the direction of the enemies of the Government? He trusted not. If, on the other hand, this stock was taken by the Government in the bank, it might be sold at any moment, if necessary, at twenty per cent. profit, or at least without a sacrifice, and thus furnish the United States with as much money as it would sell for.

Mr. LOWNDES supported the motion to strike out this section. The reservation of twenty millions for the United States, of the capital of the bank, would, he said, unquestionably be attended with some advantages. It could not be denied that it would, by the strength of this capital, or by selling it at an advance, afford the means of obtaining money for the service of the Government in the year 1816. But the course proposed by gentlemen was to lessen the security of the loan for 1815, in order, with remarkable foresight, to provide the ways and means for the year 1816. Mr. L. said, he differed from his colleague as to the application of fifteen millions of Treasury notes to the purchase of public debt, and five millions for the redemption of Treasury notes. The object of Mr. L. was nothing more than this—to induce the House to reduce the capital of the bank from its present proposed amount. It almost necessarily followed, from the main points of his colleague's plan, that the capital should be reduced. It was impossible every Treasury note thrown out should be absorbed in the bank at the times of subscription; and the amount to be issued must therefore, of necessity, exceed the amount to be paid in as a part of the capital stock of the bank. It was important, in giving additional value to the Treasury notes, that the bank stock should be made as valuable as it could. The success of the plan for immediately aiding Government by the means proposed, must depend on the value of the Treasury notes, which must depend on the value of the shares in the bank. The less valuable the shares in the bank, as they would be by the retention of so large a capital stock, the less temptation would there be to purchase the notes or stock, which is the basis of the subscription. Mr. L. said he hoped, before this subject was finally acted on, the Committee would limit to thirty or thirty-five millions, to some moderate, some reasonable amount, the circulation of the bank, and thus guard against danger of the plan from the amount of capital, at the same time that it would increase the value of the Treasury notes. The plan of the gentleman before him, (Mr. FORSYTH,) he thought it obvious, provided for the demands of the public service in 1816, by rendering utterly hazardous, if not entirely defeating, the provision for 1815. He denied that the Treasury notes to be issued in pursuance of this plan would be less valuable than those now in circulation. It was impossible, he said, in the nature of things; but, in furnishing additional modes of application of them, the Committee would increase instead of diminishing the value of Treasury notes, &c.

After a few words from Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, indicative of an impatience for the question, the Committee agreed to Mr. CALHOUN'S motion by the following vote: For the motion 79, against it 53. So the third section was struck out.

The Committee then proceeded in further examination and amendment of the details of the bill; in the course of which considerable debate took place, involving generally the minor principles of the art or science of banking. Among the amendments agreed to were the following, viz: To strike out so much as gives the Government a share in the direction of the bank; so much as prohibits the bank from selling the United States stock, which may come into its possession; so much as binds the bank to loan thirty millions to the Government, &c.

A motion was made by Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, and supported by Mr. PEARSON, to amend that part of the section authorizing the bank to establish offices of discount, deposit, and distribution, so as to require the bank, whenever the Government may direct it, to establish an office of discount and deposit at the City of Washington, with a capital (not less than five millions of dollars.) After striking out the latter clause within parentheses, the motion was negatived.

When the Committee rose for to-day, an amendment was under discussion affecting the manner in which the bank shall pay specie for its notes, whether at all its offices, or at the Mother Bank only. Immediately on the Committee's rising, the House adjourned.

— SATURDAY, November 19.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to authorize the Commissioner of the Revenue to cause a clerk in his office to aid him in signing licenses," with an amendment; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Renner and Heath—Bank of the United States.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

PETITION OF RENNER AND HEATH.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Renner & Heath, of the City of Washington. The report is as follows :

That the petitioners were owners of ropewalks in the City of Washington, in which were contained a large quantity of spun yarns and navy cordage, all of which was destroyed by the enemy in his late incursion into this city. On or about the 20th of July last, one of the petitioners, Mr. Heath, applied to Mr. Southerlan, the owner of some long boats then lying in the Potomac, and engaged of him five of them to transport his cordage and yarns up the river, if the enemy should invade the city. On the 18th or 19th of August, it was deemed expedient, by General Winder, to impress the boats of Mr. Southerlan, for the purpose of transporting the troops across the Potomac, which were kept in the employment of the Government until after the invasion of the city. On the 20th of August the petitioners applied for the boats, according to contract, for the purpose of removing their property, when they were informed that they were impressed. It also appears to the committee, that on the 22d of August the petitioners employed a wagon and nine or ten carts, for the purpose of removing the property, but the wagon and two or three of the carts were impressed by the officers of the departments, to remove the public papers and property ; and that seven of the carts employed, after taking loads from the ropewalks out of the city, refused to return to haul any more for the petitioners, apprehending, if they did, they would be impressed into the employment of the Government. It is also stated, and believed, that, after that day, and before the enemy entered the city, carriages were not to be had in the city to remove the property. The loss of the petitioners, exclusive of the price of the ropewalks, is estimated at about thirty-four thousand eight hundred dollars ; they ask of Congress to be reimbursed to the amount of their loss.

The committee are of opinion the Government is under no obligation to pay for the property. The destruction of private property by the enemy, in the progress of the war, is much to be regretted and highly deprecated ; but when it does happen, it is to be considered, between the Government and its citizens, as one of the calamities of war. It may be presumed, that the circumstance of the boats, wagon, and carts being impressed by the Government to perform services valuable to it, may create some equitable considerations in favor of the petitioners. It is, however, believed by the committee, not to be sufficient to authorize them to allow the claim ; they, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution :

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, for the reason that he thought the principles of the report questionable, and involving a case of great hardship against the petitioners, moved that the report should lie on the table.

This motion was also supported by Mr. COOPER, of Delaware, who desired further time to reflect on the subject.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Ohio, and Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, opposed this motion, and further explained the circumstances of this case, which, though a case of hardship, was one in which the Congress were under no obligation, legal or equitable, to indemnify the petitioners.

The motion to lay the report on the table was negatived ; and the yeas and nays thereon having been required by Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, the question on the adoption of the report was decided in the affirmative. For the report 80, against it 43, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Earle, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Geddes, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Irving, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moore, Nelson, Parker, Piper, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Telfair, Udree, Vose, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Cox, Culpeper, Dana, Davis of Massachusetts, Duvall, Ely, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Hale, Hanson, Hawkins, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Johnson of Virginia, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Moseley, Pearson, Pickering, Potter, Ruggles, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipherd, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

The question depending on yesterday's adjournment was, on a motion of Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, to strike out the 18th fundamental rule for the government of the bank, which is in the following words :

18. [During the continuance of the present war between the United States and Great Britain, all the votes of the said corporation, whether payable at the seat of the bank in Philadelphia, or elsewhere, shall be payable in other notes of the said corporation, in Treasury notes, or in gold and silver coin, at the bank in the city of Philadelphia, at the option of the applicant. At all the offices of discount, deposit and distribution, and of deposit and distribution only, established as aforesaid, and at all the banks employed in lieu of such offices as aforesaid, the notes of the said corporation, during the continuance of the said war, shall be payable in other notes of the said corporation, or in Treasury notes only. And] the said corporation shall, at all times, distribute among the offices and banks aforesaid, a sufficient sum in the various denominations of the notes of the said corporation, and in Treasury notes, to answer the demand therefor, and to establish a sufficient circulating medium throughout the United States and the Territories thereof.

On the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. OAKLEY modified his motion so as to strike out that part only of the rule which is in brackets; and, after some remarks in opposition from Mr. FISK, the motion was agreed to—ayes 82.

Mr. LOWNDES then moved to amend the remainder of this rule, by adding after the words "Treasury notes," the words "which it may receive upon deposit of the Government." Agreed to.

The 19th rule having been read, in the following words:

19. The officer at the head of the Treasury Department of the United States shall be furnished from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the said corporation, and of the debts due to the same; of the moneys deposited therein; of the notes in circulation, and of the cash in hand; and shall have a right to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the said statement: Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike out this rule. If the Government had no interest in or control over the institution, he saw no reason or propriety in the United States having a right to inspect the proceedings or state of the bank.

To this Mr. CALHOUN replied, that there was an obvious propriety in the United States having the right to inspect the affairs of the bank, to ascertain whether its deposits, &c., would be safe in its hands.

The motion to strike out the rule was negatived.

The 10th section, making the notes of the bank receivable in all payments of the United States, having been read—

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, moved to strike it from the bill; assigning, as a reason for this motion, that as the United States were now, by the amendments which had taken place, divested of all control over the operations of the bank, it would be proper, in self-defence, for the Government to retain in its hands the power to make the notes of the bank receivable or not, to protect it against misconduct or attempt at control by the bank.

The motion was agreed to without a division.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the section authorizing the suspension, on proclamation of the President, of specie payment, in certain cases and for certain periods, was stricken out without debate or division.

The 13th section of the bill, which pledges the faith of Congress, not to establish any other bank during the continuance of the charter—being read,

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, moved an amendment, the object of which was to except, from this prohibition, the Banking Associations existing within the District of Columbia, not at present incorporated.

Agreed to; and the bill having been gone through, the Committee recurred, on suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, to the first section of the bill.

Mr. LOWNDES made a motion, which he supported, by a train of reasoning predicated on the impracticability and unwieldiness of so large a moneied institution as this bank was proposed to be, to reduce the capital of the bank from fifty to thirty-five millions of dollars.

Mr. CALHOUN opposed the motion with much zeal, defending the proposed amount of capital on the ground of the proposed appropriation of fifteen millions of the Treasury notes for the purchase of existing stock, &c.

Mr. CUTHBERT and Mr. FORSYTH supported Mr. LOWNDES's motion, and Mr. CALHOUN replied to them.

The motion was, in the end, negatived as follows: For the motion 56, against it 75.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, an amendment was adopted to the first section of the bill, changing the time of subscription to conform it to the intimations he had before given.

On motion of the delegate from Missouri, the town of St. Louis was inserted as one of those at which subscriptions should be received, and J. B. C. Lucas, Alexander Stuart, and Bernard Pratt, named as Commissioners; and, on motion of Mr. FISK, of Vermont, Windsor in that State was also inserted, and Elias Lyman, William Levering, and Eleazer May named as Commissioners.

Various other amendments were proposed to the bill, some of which were adopted and some rejected. At length the Committee rose and reported the bill as amended.

The bill having been so interlarded and interlined with amendments by the Committee of the Whole, that the Clerk himself could scarcely arrange them or the SPEAKER state them to the House, it was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed as amended.

MONDAY, November 21.

On motion of Mr. EASTON, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire what provisions, by law, are necessary to be made for the defence of the Western and Northwestern frontiers.

On motion of Mr. HUMPHREYS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by law, the payment of the officers lately under the command of Major General Andrew Jackson, and in the service of the United States, for transporting their baggage from Natchez to Nashville, in the year 1813; and also, for the transportation of their baggage from the said State to the Mississippi Territory, on the late campaign against the Creek Indians, and on their return from said Territory to the State of Tennessee.

TAX ON CARRIAGES.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of the Government and maintaining public credit, by laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons, and the harness thereof; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. EPPES also communicated the following letter from the Commissioner of the Revenue:

H. OF R.

Public Buildings in Washington.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

NOVEMBER 15, 1814.

SIR: No subject of internal taxation has, in its collection, been attended with so much difficulty, as the duty on carriages, either under the old or existing system, between which there is a close, though not an entire resemblance. This difficulty may be intrinsic, or may proceed from the incorrectness of the principle on which the duty is laid. After making a fair allowance for the first circumstance, I am, on a full consideration of the subject, satisfied that the principle of the existing act is incorrect. This conviction is corroborated by the abundant evidence on the files of the revenue office that the duty is extremely unequal. This is in so great a degree the case, that the small sum of two dollars is frequently paid on carriages of greater value than those which pay seven, and even ten dollars.

This inequality proceeds from the erroneous principle on which carriages are classed, the leading feature of which is the kind of springs on which they hang, which is rarely a true criterion of their value.

It seems to be universally admitted that the duty should be graduated according to the value of the carriage.

I feel a confidence in the opinion that no classification, founded on name or form, can equitably equalize the duty. This will be manifest from considering the ceaseless activity of human ingenuity in devising new forms, especially where the caprice of fashion rules, perhaps, more imperiously than reason, and novelty and ornament are more esteemed than utility.

The only remaining resort is, a classification according to the value, which, I think, presents the fewest difficulties, and which, besides the attainment of a just equality, will be attended with many other benefits. I have, accordingly, taken the liberty to form a bill on this principle.

If the proposed bill should not be accepted by the Committee of Ways and Means, a regard to the public interests calls for the expression of the opinion, that it will be indispensable to make three radical amendments in the existing act:

First. To lay the duty on all carriages not exclusively employed in husbandry or the transportation of goods. Under the present equivocal provision some abuses are practised, and much greater are expected, which may, perhaps, prove the act incapable of execution.

Second. To increase the penalty for not entering a carriage.

Third. To define what is meant by "iron springs," a substance which, according to the opinions of seventeen out of twenty-one respectable coachmakers, in different parts of the United States, now before me, cannot exist. Agreeably to this opinion, as it corresponds with my own, it will become my duty, unless the existing act be altered, to instruct the collectors to receive the lowest duty for the various classes of carriages, however expensive and elegant in their structure, which hang on iron jacks or bows, or any other iron substance. I am, with great respect,

S. H. SMITH.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, from the committee on the subject, made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred a resolution directing them to inquire into the expediency of rebuilding or repairing the public buildings, &c., report that, among the first steps deemed necessary in discharge of the duties assigned them, they caused the Superintendent of the City to lay before them the reports of several architects and mechanics of reputed skill and character, who had, at his request, examined the remains of the public buildings, all of whom reported, as their opinion, that the walls generally had not been materially damaged, and were not rendered unsafe or insufficient to rebuild on, conformably either to the former plan, or to some variations suggested, or such as may be adopted as improvements in the rebuilding.

These reports were accompanied by estimates of various amounts, forming an average of $458,000. The whole first cost of these buildings appears to have been $1,215,110 10.

With the view of better understanding the grounds, and probable accuracy of the reports and estimates, the committee attended personally at the Capitol, and examined the state of that building, where, after a conference, and making such inquiries of an architect on the spot, as were considered proper, they were induced to believe that the walls of both wings of the Capitol may be safely built on, and that the estimated expense of about $250,000 for repairing the same, was as nearly accurate, and as much to be relied on, as could be reasonably expected, or as circumstances either admitted or required.

With the foregoing information, the committee proceeded to a due and general consideration of the subject-matter referred to them, and readily came to the decision, that it was expedient, either to repair the late buildings, or to build others in their stead on different sites; but as it appeared that the latter could not be effected without incurring a great additional expense, so much greater, as the committee conceived, than would be counterbalanced by any "public interest or convenience," to be derived from a "change of sites," they were of opinion that it would be inexpedient to make such a change. Connected with this part of the duty prescribed by the committee, it may not be improper that they should state to the House the representations of sundry individuals, who allege, and offer to prove, that the designation of the present sites by President WASHINGTON, who possessed full power, having been always considered by him as part of the permanent plan of the city, they purchased at very advanced prices, and improved lots, on the faith of those designations near those sites, the supposed permanency whereof has ever since sustained the value of all adjacent and contiguous property; but that, if those sites were now to be altered without some equivalent public establishment being made thereon, they apprehended that this property would become comparatively valueless during the lifetime of the present holders at least. The committee, however, desire it to be understood that other views and considerations having induced their decision on this member of the resolution, under which their inquiries were directed, they did not enter into the discussion of, or give any opinion of the force or validity of these considerations.

From the suggestions of the architects consulted, and also from the observations of the committee, they are of opinion that parts of the walls, arches, and columns, of the late buildings, are in a state requiring a small expense for workmanship and materials, to preserve them from injury by the weather, and from falling down, thereby endangering the vaulting which supports some of the floors, and which at present is very little, if at all, weakened by the burning; but as there is no money applicable to the payment of such expense, inconsiderable as it may be, the committee beg leave to suggest the propriety of an appropriation for that object.

The committee think it not irrelative to the object of their inquiries, though it is not specifically enjoined, to state, also, that the several banks within the District of Columbia, desirous of facilitating an object so interesting to the District, have made a formal and binding offer, in writing, to advance on loan to the Government, upon reasonable terms, the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, to be applied exclusively to the purpose of rebuilding or repairing the President's house, Capitol, and public offices.

Conformably to the foregoing statement, the committee ask leave to report a bill.

Mr. LEWIS then reported a bill, making appropriations for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings in the City of Washington. [The bill proposes to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be forthwith rebuilt or repaired the public buildings, on their present sites; and, for this purpose exclusively, to borrow such sum as may be necessary for the purpose, from the banks or individuals within the District.] Twice read, and committed.

Mr. STANFORD offered, for consideration, the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to inquire and report whether the present Chambers of the two Houses can be so altered, or otherwise improved, as to be rendered more convenient for their deliberations, or better rooms provided during the present session, within a convenient distance of the public offices.

Mr. LEWIS moved to strike out all the resolve, after the word "deliberations."—Negatived, 72 to 48.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, moved to lay the resolve on the table.—Negatived.

Mr. LEWIS then moved to add, at the end of the resolve, the words "within the City of Washington."

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to amend the amendment, by adding, after those words, "in the District of Columbia."—Agreed to, 67 to 49.

The question was then taken on the amendment, as amended, and negatived.

The question recurring on the original motion of Mr. STANFORD, it was opposed by Messrs. LEWIS, PEARSON of North Carolina, FARROW of South Carolina; and supported by Messrs. STANFORD and GROSVENOR.

Mr. FARROW moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution indefinitely, which motion was negatived.—For the postponement 60, against it 66.

After some appropriate objections by Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, the question on the adoption of the resolve was decided in the affirmative, as follows:—For the resolve 62, against it 60.

And Messrs. STANFORD, GROSVENOR, ROBERTSON, LEWIS, and PEARSON, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House took up the amendments, reported by the Committee of the Whole, to the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

The amendments to the first section having been taken up, and the question being about to be put generally; on motion, of Mr. FORSYTH, the question was divided, and first put on agreeing to such amendments as add places of subscription and names of Commissioners; and, with modifications, that class of amendments was agreed to.

The question was then stated on agreeing to the amendments, which go to change the times and mode of subscription, viz: to make the number of shares five hundred thousand, at one hundred dollars, instead of one hundred thousand, at five hundred dollars; to be subscribed and paid in on the two last days of January next, and the three last days of each succeeding month of the year 1815.

On this question, Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said he had no idea of renewing, at this time, the debate on this subject, having already expressed his sentiments on this project. He wished it at the same time to be distinctly understood, that he was not prevented from doing so by any signs of impatience exhibited in the House; because he should never be deterred from doing his duty by any emotion which might be thereby excited. But he thought it fair, for the gentlemen who advocated the amendments made by the committee to this bill, to make it as perfect as they could; and reserved the right, when the bill should be perfected, to make such remarks as the subject should appear to him to call for. As, however, the House had not expressed their sense directly, on the subject of the change of the principles of the bill, he should call for the yeas and nays on the first question which should involve the principle of the main amendment.

The amendments to the first section were then all agreed to; and the section was further amended, on suggestion of various gentlemen.

Mr. BRIGHAM moved to strike out fifty, and to insert twenty-five millions, as the capital of the bank. In support of this motion, he observed, that the professed objects of the bill were, to restore public credit, and establish a sufficient circulating medium. To effect these important objects, it is intended to authorize the issuing of forty-four millions of dollars in Treasury notes, and in such small denominations as shall be accommodated to the ordinary transactions of life. The whole of the Treasury notes are to be put into circulation in the course of the year, and become the circulating medium of the country. If it were possible to throw these notes into circulation in the term of twelve months, it would deluge the country with paper money, under the name of Treasury notes, and they would depreciate in proportion to the quantity you throw into the market. It is now pretty well ascertained, that this description of notes, now in circulation, have depreciated 20 per cent.; and if you obtain eighty cents only for the dollar, the Government in the first outset will, on the forty-four millions of dollars, make a sacrifice of eight millions eight hundred thousand. This will not restore public credit, nor secure the confidence of the people in the wisdom or ability of the Government, nor will it raise the price of public stock.

The whole capital stock of the bank is to consist of six millions of dollars in specie, and forty-four millions in Treasury notes; making, in the whole, a capital stock of fifty millions of dollars. The forty-four millions in these paper notes will not be the representative of specie or of wealth, but the representative of national poverty—of an enormous debt; and will be evidence, in the hands of every individual who shall hold them, of a public debt, which he or they must be taxed to pay.

Mr. B. said, that he did not believe there could be found six millions of dollars in specie within the limits of these United States, that would associate and keep company with forty-four millions of Treasury notes. And it was not reasonable to suppose that the capitalists of the country would, for the privilege of operating on six millions of specie, on banking principles, loan to the Government forty-four millions. Yet, this is the condition upon which the bank is to go into operation; for, the bank will not be authorized to operate on the six millions until they shall have purchased the forty-four millions of dollars in Treasury notes; and without this purchase the prime object of the bill will be defeated, and the exigencies of the Government in no part provided for or satisfied.

Sir, said Mr. B. if the capital stock of the bank is reduced from fifty to twenty-five millions of dollars, it may be within the purchase of the capitalists of the country, and possibly may, at some future period, be within the power and ability of the Government to redeem; but, the present circumstances of the country will not justify the establishment of a bank of fifty millions. If it is designed that the bank shall issue their paper upon that part of the capital stock which consists of Treasury notes, then, according to the ordinary principles of banking, the bank may issue one hundred millions of dollars in their bills, and every man knows that the bank will not, cannot, redeem this enormous sum of paper with six millions of specie only. Of course, the bank notes or bills issued under such circumstances, and in such profusion, will be of no more value than paper money, and must ruin thousands of our fellow-citizens, unless you make a tender law, and that will increase the mischiefs and distress the nation.

In the days of our national prosperity, it was supposed that the whole amount of specie within these United States exceeded thirty millions of dollars; and then there was no complaint for want of a sufficient circulating medium, nor was there complaint for want of specie capital in the United States' Bank, lately put down, whose capital stock consisted only of ten millions of dollars. But, now, in these times of public embarrassment, when there is not more than fifteen millions of dollars in specie within the limits of these United States, you propose to establish a bank, whose capital stock shall consist of fifty millions of dollars!

To pass this bill, and authorize the circulation of forty-four millions of paper dollars, in addition to the present circulating medium of the country, will surfeit the nation with paper, and will greatly impair, if not wholly destroy, the public credit.

It is proposed that fifteen millions of the forty-four of these Treasury notes shall be placed in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to enable them to pay the same amount of the public debt. Whoever supposes that this provision will enable the Government, through the medium of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to diminish the public debt, will be greatly deceived; for, if the fifteen millions of Treasury notes are sold in the market, as they have been—that is, at the rate of 20 per cent. discount—there will be a sacrifice of three millions of dollars. So, by this provision, instead of diminishing, you will increase the public debt; and, to make the best of this process, you will only change the name or plan, and keep the debt.

Mr. B. said, he did not believe that the bill, with its present provisions, was calculated to relieve the Government of its present embarrassments, or to promote the public interest or convenience, did he think this system to be practicable; and he hoped that the motion would prevail, and that the capital stock would be reduced.

Mr. CALHOUN replied to the argument of Mr. BRIGHAM, and explained the process by which the Treasury notes, which appeared to alarm the gentleman so much, would be absorbed.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, explained, at some length and with much clearness, the objections he entertained to the present magnitude of the capital of the bank, founded on the disproportion of the paper to the specie to be subscribed, and the impracticability of the circulation and absorption of so much paper. He concluded his observations by intimating, that if the gentleman from Massachusetts would withdraw his motion, he (Mr. L.) would substitute "thirty" instead of "twenty-five" as the amount to which he desired the capital of the bank to be reduced.

Mr. BRIGHAM declined to vary his motion; but subsequently waived it until the House should have acted on all the amendments proposed.

The House then proceeded to the amendments to the second section, which embrace the principle of Mr. CALHOUN's amendment, and which put the second section in the following shape:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person, copartnership, or body politic, to subscribe for so many shares of the said capital stock of the said bank, as he, she, or they, shall think fit; and the sums respectively subscribed shall be payable in the manner following, that is to say: six millions of dollars in gold or silver coin of the United States; or in gold coin of Spain, or the dominions of Spain, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-eight grains and sixty-hundredths of a grain of the actual weight thereof, or in other foreign gold or silver coin, at the several rates prescribed by the first section of an act regulating the currency of foreign coins in the United States, passed tenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and six; and forty-four millions of dollars thereof in such gold or silver coin as aforesaid, or in Treasury notes now authorized, or to be authorized, to be issued in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend this section by adding the following clause to the end thereof—which motion would restore the principle embraced by the bill as first reported, viz:

“Or in the public debt of the United States, contracted by virtue of the act of Congress, entitled ‘An act authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding eleven millions of dollars,’ passed the 14th day of March, 1812, or contracted by virtue of any subsequent act or acts of Congress authorizing a loan or loans.”

This question was decided, without debate, by yeas and nays. For the motion 45, against it 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bines, Brigham, Brown, Champion, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hall, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Hungerford, Ingham, Lewis, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sage, Smith of Pennsylvania, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Williams, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Boyd, Bradley, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Cilley, Clark, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Desha, Duval, Earle, Ely, Evans, Forney, Gaston, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Hale, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hulbert, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McKee, McLean, Moore, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Sharp, Sheffey, Shepherd, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Yancey.

So the motion was negatived.

A motion of Mr. GASTON was more successful, being agreed to, to amend the bill by striking out the words in italic, and in lieu thereof insert, in the first place, the words “on each share twelve dollars,” and in the second place the words “eighty-eight”—so that subscriptions shall be paid in the proportion of twelve dollars in specie and eighty-eight in Treasury notes, on each share of $100.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, moved to strike out, in the latter part of this section, the words “in such gold or silver coin as aforesaid, or”—his object being to require Treasury notes, only, to be received in payment of the eighty-eight dollars on each share allowed to be paid in that way. The motion was negatived, 75 to 58.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, then moved to add after the words “now authorized,” in the latter clause of the above section, the words “to be issued,” his object being to allow to be received in payment on the bank shares as well those Treasury notes now in circulation, or already authorized to be put in circulation, as those hereafter to be authorized, &c. The motion was negatived, yeas 26.

The question on the amended section having been divided, was, on the suggestion of Mr. KILBOURN, of Ohio, first taken on striking out so much of the original second section of the bill as limits the subscription of any individual or body politic (the United States excepted) to 1,000 shares.

This part of the amended section having been agreed to, the question recurred on the main principle of the section as amended.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, requested the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence with the Committee of the Whole on agreeing to the amendment. He believed the plan embraced in the amendments to be fanciful and wholly impracticable, and such as would, in its failure, prove more ruinous in its consequences to the community than could be well anticipated. He, therefore, desired to record his vote against it.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, opposed the amendment and conjured gentlemen on the same side with himself to oppose this amendment, embracing a system which, he said, he was confident would disappoint the hopes of its projectors, and prostrate the party now in power. If the House should determine to exclude the holders of the stock of the United States from any participation in the subscription, and should permit the bank to go into operation, as was proposed, whenever $13,200,000 should be subscribed, it would fall wholly into the hands of the opponents of the present Administration, who would never lend the United States a cent of the capital of the bank, but employ it as far as possible in opposing the measures of the Government. The very moment the subscription is opened, Mr. F. said, it would be filled by those who have modestly told you that they alone are competent to carry on the operations of the Government, and its influence be employed against the measures of the Government. Rather than follow such an ignis fatuus as this, Mr. F. said, he would take his hat, make his bow, and retire from the House at once. The bill did not contain a single provision to oblige a man to pay in his subscription in Treasury notes. The bill, he said, as proposed to be amended, would completely disappoint its projectors. In the first place it would shut out our friends, all the subscribers to the old stock who have exhausted their funds, and in the next place the only subscribers to the bank would be those who wish us, as they say, to retire as soon as possible, and who have not aided us very much in the prosecution of the war. They are under no obligation by this bill to loan money to the Government—and they would not do it until better times and better men being in the Government (according to their modest opinion of themselves) should authorize them in doing it.

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Mr. F. said he was for taking a practical course in whatever he did, and, therefore, he would never agree to such a system as this.

Mr. CALHOUN said, in reply to these remarks, that it was a sound rule in legislation, not to act with a view to benefit one or another party, but with a view to promote the national good. If a bank was to be erected to prop up this or that party, Mr. C. said, it should not receive his sanction. In moving the amendment, he said, he had not been governed by views of so limited a character. He had regarded the nation as a nation, and not as divided into two political parties. The subscription was equally open to both parties; and although the moneyed class attached to the ruling party might be exhausted, the farming interest was not in so miserable a situation. Mr. C. was not willing to recognise the correctness of the picture which the gentleman had drawn of the great Republican party, as exhausted and moneyless. Although there was great capital on one side, so there was on the other; and it is our boast that the yeomanry, the substantial part of the population, are on that side of the question to which we belong. The very amendments proposed, and now objected to, present the opportunity to every capitalist, however inconsiderable, to share in the capital of the bank, &c., and to disseminate its benefits all over the country, &c. As to the control over the bank, Mr. C. contended that the amendments, retaining the power over deposits and of making the bills receivable for the revenue or otherwise, gave the Government a greater control than it before possessed over the operations of the bank, &c. Legislation on party principles, he said, must ever react on the party pursuing it. He would, therefore, not resort to it. No, said he; rather let us act on national, on great principles.

Mr. FISK rejoined, and defended with his usual point the ground he had taken.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, took occasion, in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, to disclaim the operation of any party feelings in recommending to the House the system advocated by the gentleman from Vermont—from whom, although he agreed with him in opposition to the present amendment, he differed as to the grounds of his opposition.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on agreeing to the 2d section as amended, and decided in the affirmative. For the amendment, 87, against it 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bines, Bowen, Bradbury, Bradley, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Ely, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Hale, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hulbert, Irving, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Virginia, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McKee, McLean, Moore, Oakley, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickering, NAYS—Messrs. And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, November 22.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the remainder of the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the bill to incorporate the Bank of the United States of America.

That amendment of the Committee of the Whole to strike out the third section of the original bill (authorizing the Government to subscribe twenty millions to the capital of the bank) was concurred in.

The amendment being under consideration which strikes out so much of the original bill as allows to the Government the appointment of five directors of the bank—

The amendment was opposed by Messrs. ROBERTSON, GHOLSON, and WRIGHT, and supported by Messrs. CALHOUN, GROSVENOR, and LEWIS.

[The advocates of this amendment contended that the power of appointment of five of the directors of the bank would be merely nominal as to any control over the operations of the institution, which control would be much better effected by the power of the Government to withhold its deposits, &c. On the other hand, it was said that a large majority of the directors would probably be, in future, as they have been heretofore, adverse to the politics of the Government, and, unless properly guarded, would be disposed to thwart its operations, and favor the views of its opponents, &c.]

The question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in this amendment to the bill, was decided—for the amendment 86, against it 64, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clark, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Duvall, Earle, Ely, Evans, Findley, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Glasgow, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lewis, Lovett,

The House proceeded in the further consideration of the amendments to the bill.

When the House came to that amendment to the 10th rule for the government of the bank, which is expressed in the following words: "But the said corporation may sell any part of the public debt whereof its stock shall be composed:"

A motion was made by Mr. FORSYTH so to amend this amendment as to make it read as follows: "But the said corporation shall not sell any part of the public debt whereof its stock shall be composed, during the present war."

After a debate of considerable length and warmth, the question on the motion to amend the amendment was decided—for the motion 64, against the motion 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Barnett, Bines, Bowen, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Conard, Creighton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Smith of Pennsylvania, Tannehill, Telfair, Udree, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Wright.

The motion of Mr. FORSYTH having been thus rejected—

The amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, as first above stated, was amended by adding thereto the following, on motion of Mr. RICH:

"Provided, that, during the continuance of the present war, the said corporation shall not, without the consent of Congress, sell or dispose of their public debt to an amount above ten millions of dollars."

A motion was made by Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, further to amend the said amendment by adding to it as follows: "nor after the war any part thereof at a price less than its par value." This motion was negatived.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, was then agreed to.

Other amendments were then considered and agreed to.

The amendment to the 12th rule for the government of the bank is to strike out the following clause:

"But the said corporation shall be bound to loan to the Government of the United States thirty millions of dollars, at an interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, in such sums, and at such periods as, consistently with the objects of the Government, may be made mutually convenient to the Government and the corporation, whenever any law or laws shall authorize and require such loan or loans."

The question on concurring in this amendment was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradley, Brigham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Duvall, Ely, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McKee, McKim, McLean, Miller, Moore, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Pleasants, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Sharp, Sheffey, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Tallmadge, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Yancey—86.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The House having under consideration the new section added to the bill by the Committee of the Whole, giving the Congress power at any time to appoint a special committee to examine into the state of the bank, a motion was made by Mr. KILBOURN to amend the same by adding thereto the following :

"And if, upon full investigation, it shall appear that the said corporation have exceeded their powers, or violated any of the provisions or restrictions of this act, it shall be within the power of Congress to declare their charter void."

This motion was negatived, after debate, and the new section concurred in.

All the amendments made in Committee of the Whole having been agreed to, on motion of Mr. PICKENS, the House agreed to reconsider the disagreement to Mr. SHARP's motion to amend the bill by excluding other medium but Treasury notes being received in payment of that portion, of the subscription on each share, which is proposed to be paid in that way.

And the question being put on now agreeing to this amendment, after debate, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 23.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States and Territories thereof for their respective quotas of eighty thousand four hundred and thirty militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States against invasion;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.—The bill was read twice and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the bill making further provisions for filling the ranks of the regular Army by classifying the free male population of the United States.

BANKS OF NEW YORK.

Mr. IRVING presented the memorial of a committee appointed by five of the banks in the city of New York, to take into consideration all matters relating to the state of credit in that city, remonstrating against the proposed incorporation of the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

The memorial of the subscribers, committees appointed by five of the banks in the city of New York, to take into consideration all matters relating to the state of credit in the city, respectfully represents—

That your memorialists, with great deference to the wisdom of Congress, presume that it will not be considered as unbecoming in them to express their opinions on a subject which they have practically under their constant view.

That they see with great alarm the proposed incorporation of a Bank of the United States with a capital of fifty millions of dollars; not that they are insensible of the advantages of such an institution, but because they are persuaded, in their most deliberate view of the subject, that the present time is most inauspicious for the creation of such a bank, and that so far from aiding the fiscal operations of the Government, it will, in their opinion, tend to embarrass still more, than the adverse circumstances of the times have already done, all public as well as private credit.

Your memorialists firmly believe that the proposed capital will be found too large.

That six millions of dollars in specie cannot be obtained by any inducements which can be held out, and that a less sum will not afford a proper security to the public.

That, even if six millions could be procured, the payment of the notes in specie could only be continued for a short period, under the present circumstances of the country.

That if, by the exercise of the power proposed to be lodged in the President of the United States, the notes are not paid in specie, they will infallibly depreciate.

That, if they depreciate, no existing bank can possibly take them without the greatest injury to their stockholders.

That if the notes are not taken by the present banks throughout the United States, they cannot serve as a general medium of circulation.

A full discussion of this subject, your memorialists are well aware, would transgress the proper limits of this memorial; they will therefore confine themselves to a few of the reasons which have induced them to form these opinions. They think that the capital will be found too large, because the late Bank of the United States had only a capital of ten millions of dollars at the period of our greatest commercial prosperity, and, since the expiration of the charter of that bank, the amount of its capital has been much more than supplied by the incorporation of other banks. It is believed to have been the opinion of the part of the community best informed on that subject, that this amount was abundantly sufficient. Your memorialists therefore cannot but dread the effects which a new banking capital of fifty millions must have upon the paper circulation of the country, particularly when it is considered, that the proposed bank is to be pledged to lend to the Government thirty millions, which the public exigencies will probably very soon call for, without any power of refusal being left to those who are to manage the bank, even if convinced that the emission of so large a sum in notes must be ruinous to the bank itself.

It is well known that a great and constant drain of the precious metals from the United States has existed for a long time past, while supplies of them have been cut off by the war; and that the alarms necessarily existing during a war, have induced many timid and cautious persons to hoard specie, the consequence of which has been to render a suspension of specie payments necessary to the different banks in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and in various other parts of the United States. Notwithstanding the utmost care has been taken to restrain the circulation of notes within moderate bounds, yet it has been found impossible to prevent a difference in value between specie and the notes of banks in the best credit. This difference is now, in the city of New York, from twelve to fifteen per cent., and in other places still greater. Your memorialists have therefore no hesitation in giving it as their opinion that six millions of specie cannot be procured; but they are persuaded also, that, if procured, that sum could not long supply specie payments, because, as the same causes are likely still to operate, and with increased effect, when the paper circulation is so much increased as it must be by the proposed loans to the Government, it is believed that as fast as the notes are issued they will be returned for specie; as they bear no interest, there will be no inducement for any person to hold them, to counteract the great advantage offered by the high price for specie, in sending them for payment.

If it should be found necessary to restrain the bank from paying specie, your memorialists are convinced the notes will depreciate. The Treasury notes which have been issued have done so, although in much less quantity, and under more favorable circumstances, because bearing interest and being payable at definite periods. While Treasury notes have these obvious advantages, it is not perceived that the notes of the proposed bank will have any to balance them, the security having been presumed the same in both cases. The expenses of the war must, in the first instance, be paid in these notes, and of course they will be, to a considerable extent, in the hands of persons who must, of necessity, dispose of them for what they will bring. The late Bank of the United States, while redeeming its notes in specie and possessing the entire support of the Government and the confidence of the public, never had, it is believed, more than six millions of notes in circulation. The banks in the city of New York, whose aggregate capital is about fifteen millions of dollars, have not, upon an average, had a circulation of more than five millions, although possessing all the advantages to be derived from the business and support of the Government in this city. Presuming that the proportion of circulation to capital is nearly the same in other parts of the United States, and taking into view that the circulation is probably as great at the present period as, under the circumstances of the country and the removal of the check of specie payments, it can safely be, can it be doubted what the effect of an additional emission even of twenty millions of paper will necessarily be?

As it appears evident to your memorialists that the notes of the proposed bank must depreciate, it appears equally so, that no existing bank can take them without the greatest injury to their stockholders. However disposed they may be to aid the fiscal operations of the Government, yet, from the moment the notes are depreciated, if they are taken either in payment or in deposits, all their debts will be paid in that description of paper, the circulation of their own notes will nearly cease, and they will be left in possession of notes redeemable at some future uncertain period and bearing no present interest. Can such a sacrifice of the interest of their constituents be called for or expected from the present institutions?

It has been supposed that the want of a medium of general circulation rendered a National Bank necessary; but your memorialists beg leave to observe, that while they admit the want of a medium, they are quite persuaded that bank notes will not answer the purpose, unless they can be exchanged at pleasure for specie, or taken generally by the banks throughout the United States. If your memorialists are right in the opinions already stated, it appears to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the notes of the proposed bank will not supply the place of a general medium.

As your memorialists are persuaded that the best interests of the United States require that the suspension of specie payments, which has unfortunately been found necessary, should be continued for as short a period as possible, they dread the increased difficulty which an additional paper circulation probably of thirty or forty millions will occasion; they fear it will approach to an insuperable bar to the resumption of specie payments; while, on the other hand, a National Bank, founded upon proper principles, and at a more favorable period, when there was a reasonable prospect of continuing to pay specie, would offer the best remedy for the deranged state of the circulation, and a most powerful instrument to renovate the commercial credit of the United States.

Your memorialists beg the indulgence of Congress when they add, that they have no doubt that Treasury bills, issued nearly in the way proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, would be found of more service to the Government, be much less dangerous to the public, and tend much more to supply the want of a general medium of circulation. They believe that Treasury notes, issued for various denominations, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, but not at any definite periods, bearing interest while in circulation at the present rate, but fundable at the option of the holder at a higher rate of interest, would be less liable to depreciation than the notes of a bank bearing no interest, and the security being the same. The present interest on the Treasury notes would offer an inducement to keep them, and, whenever the market was overcharged, the power to fund them at a higher rate of interest would take off the redundancy. In this way the issue of Treasury notes would probably operate, to a considerable amount, as a constant loan at a reduced rate of interest: nor should it be overlooked that the consequences of a depreciation, if it unfortunately should take place, would neither be so extensive nor so lasting as in the case of a Bank of the United States.

DISCIPLINE OF THE ARMY.

The following report was received from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Nov. 22, 1814.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant, requesting information whether the Army of the United States was trained by any uniform system of discipline, and, if not, what were the causes that have prevented it, and whether any legislative provision was necessary to effect the same, has the honor to report—

1. That no uniform system of discipline has heretofore been practised in training the Armies of the United States, either in line, by battalion, or company.

2. That, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, it would be advisable to institute a Board of General and Field Officers, to digest and report to this Department a system of discipline for the Army of the United States; which report, when approved by the President of the United States, should be carried into effect under the orders of this Department.

3. That the sanction of Congress, by a resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, to this measure, if not absolutely necessary, in consideration of the powers already vested in this Department by law, would, nevertheless, have a very salutary effect.

JAMES MONROE.

HON. SPEAKER, House of Representatives.

The report was, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, referred to a select committee.

Two other reports were also received from the War Department, in relation to the burning of the Potomac and Eastern Branch bridges. Neither, nor any part of either, the Secretary reports, was destroyed under the orders of the War Department.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to "incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America."

The question depending yesterday, on Mr. SHARP's motion, was, after further debate, decided in the affirmative.

The bill having been further amended, a motion was made by Mr. GASTON further to amend the bill, by striking out "fifty millions," the proposed amount of the capital of the bank, and inserting "twenty" in lieu thereof.

This motion was supported by Mr. WEBSTER, in a speech of considerable length; which he had not concluded when the Secretary of the Senate was announced, and, in becoming terms, informed the House of the decease of the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, and the resolution the Senate had thereupon adopted.

On motion of Mr. FINDLEY, of Pennsylvania, the business on hand was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAM REED,

Resolved, unanimously, That this House doth concur in the resolution of the Senate, for the appointment of a joint committee, "to consider and report measures proper to manifest the public respect for the memory of the deceased," and expressive of the deep regret of the Congress of the United States, for the loss of a citizen so highly respected and revered.

Mr. WILLIAM REED, Mr. MACON, Mr. TALLMADGE, and Mr. NELSON, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

THURSDAY, November 24.

DEATH OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings having been read—

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, rose and observed, that, after the melancholy event recorded in the Journal just read, it could scarcely be considered proper for the Speaker to call for petitions, or for the House to proceed to the orders of the day. The nation well knows what Congress ought to feel for the loss of the Vice President of the United States. In order to exhibit that feeling in a proper manner, Mr. MACON moved the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That, from an unfeigned respect to the late ELBRIDGE GERRY, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, the SPEAKER'S Chair be shrouded with black during the present session; and, as a further testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members of this House go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

"Resolved, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of ELBRIDGE GERRY, late Vice President of the United States, to-day, at two o'clock."

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, November 25.

On motion of Mr. BOWEN, of Tennessee,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying for the horses lost or destroyed in the campaign, against the hostile Creek Indians, commanded by Major General Jackson.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Illinois, presented for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the defence of the frontiers of the United States, by continuing and increasing the number of rangers heretofore authorized; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, advocated the adoption of this motion; which, however, on the suggestion of Mr. TROUP, that the Military Committee already had a similar proposition before them, and were about to act on it, was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STEVENSON, of Illinois, supported by Mr. EASTON, of Missouri, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations or amendments are necessary by law to be made in the act confirming certain claims to lands in the Illinois Territory, and providing for their location, passed in April, 1814.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what, further provision by law is expedient to be made for giving the right of pre-emption to public lands to certain settlers in the Illinois Territory.

REMISSION OF FORFEITURE.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of Justin and Elias Lyman; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next. The report is as follows:

That the facts which are material to the decision on the prayer of the petition, are contained in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of this committee, which accompanies this report. From this statement of facts it appears, 1st. That the unlawful importation was made by the express order of the agents of the petitioners; 2d. That the papers of the schooner and her cargo, exhibited on the entry at the custom-house at Newport, were false, colorable, and fraudulent; 3d. That the real facts of the case coming accidentally to the knowledge of the Collector, without any disclosure on the part of the petitioners, the schooner and cargo were seized and labelled as forfeited; and the late Secretary of the Treasury refused to remit the forfeitures incurred, "because it did not appear, to his satisfaction, that the said forfeitures and penalties were incurred without wilful negligence or any intention of fraud. On a review of the circumstances of the case, the committee concur in the opinion already pronounced by the Treasury Department, that the petitioners are not entitled to relief. The following resolution is, therefore, submitted:

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 21, 1814.

SIR: In answer to your inquiries, on behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, I have the honor to state, that, on the 28th of June, 1814, the late Secretary of the Treasury decided not to remit the forfeitures and penalties incurred by the petitioners, because "it did not appear, to his satisfaction, that the said forfeitures and penalties were incurred, without any wilful negligence or intention of fraud." I cannot discover any reason to presume that the Secretary declined acting, at any time, on the ground that the general power to remit did not embrace the present case, and having, in fact, acted, his decision is final, unless the petitioners can entitle themselves, by the equitable circumstances of the case, to the favor of Congress.

The information to be collected in this Department, upon the merits of the case, appears to authorize the following general statement of facts:

That the petitioners, merchants of New York, in April or May, 1810, were holders of bills of exchange for £1,100 sterling, drawn in Berbice, on merchants in Glasgow, which they negotiated, but which they were afterwards obliged to pay, on being returned protested for non-payment. That, in the Spring of 1811, the petitioners sent the bills to Berbice, in order to recover the amount from the drawer, and their agents accepted a quantity of coffee in payment. That the coffee was shipped from Berbice to St. Andrew's, in Nova Scotia, where it arrived in the month of February or March, 1812, and was there landed and stored. That, upon the declaration of war, in June, 1812, the petitioners assigned the coffee, in trust, to Messrs. Murray and Sons, of New York, who were well known at St. Andrew's, and, particularly, to the consignees of the coffee. That, on the 26th of December, 1812, the petitioners applied to the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Gallatin) for permission to import the coffee into the United States, but were refused. That, early in the year 1813, the consignees requested Messrs. Murray and Sons to remove the coffee, expressing some doubts of its safety at St. Andrew's; and, thereupon, Messrs. Murray and Sons, at the instance of the petitioners, assigned the coffee, in trust, to a Portuguese, in order that it might be protected, as neutral property, from British capture, on its passage to the United States. That the coffee was afterwards (about the 2d of August, 1813) shipped on board of a Portuguese schooner, and brought to Newport, in Rhode Island, about the 24th of August, 1813, when the captain of the schooner reported that he had arrived from St. Bartholomew. That the captain delivered to the Collector of Newport sundry documents, and, particularly, 1st. Certificates, dated Gustavia, St. Bartholomew, June 26th and 28th, 1813, stating the cargo of coffee to be the growth and produce of Spanish settlements, and that it had been imported into that island; 2d. A clearance for the Portuguese schooner, dated at Gustavia, island of St. Bartholomew, June 26th, 1813, particularly specifying the cargo of coffee. That, upon these documents, the schooner was admitted to an entry, bonds were given for the duties, and the cargo was landed. That the real facts of the case coming accidentally to the knowledge of the Collector, without any disclosure on the part of the petitioners, the schooner and the coffee were seized and libelled as forfeited under the non-importation law; the petitioners applied, in due form, to the Secretary of the Treasury for a remission, and the Secretary decided not to remit.

Upon these general facts the District Attorney and the Collector of Newport have objected to a remission of the forfeiture; 1st. Because the unlawful importation was made by the express order of the agents of the petitioners; 2d. Because it did not appear that the petitioners informed their agent that the Secretary of the Treasury had refused to permit the importation of the coffee; 3d. That the papers of the schooner and her cargo, exhibited on the entry at the custom-house at Newport, were false, colorable, and fraudulent.

In answer to these objections the petitioners allege: 1st. That, by clothing the American property with a neutral cover, they meant to elude the British cruisers and privateers, not to violate the laws of this country; 2d. That the colorable documents, respecting the origin of the cargo, and the clearance of the vessel, were put on board by the agent of the petitioners, without their authority, and might have been designed to enable the schooner to escape capture by American privateers, until the vessel should arrive in a port of the United States, when an appeal could be made to the equity of the Government for relief against the forfeiture incurred by the importation; 3d. That the captain of the Portuguese schooner was ignorant of our language and laws; that he made an entry without instructions from the petitioners, and contrary to their intention; and that the colorable papers ought not to have been produced at the custom-house without an explanation of the facts; 4th. That the silence of the petitioners, on the impropriety of the entry upon false papers, was owing to their desire to avoid involving the Portuguese captain in the penalties of the law.

Under these circumstances, the case rests with the committee; and (returning the papers accompanying their reference) I have only to repeat the assurances of the sincere respect with which I am, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, resumed the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

The question under consideration being on Mr. GASTON's motion to substitute "twenty" for "fifty" millions of dollars, as the amount of the capital of the bank—

Mr. WEBSTER concluded the speech which he commenced on Wednesday, in opposition to the bill as it now stands. In the course of his remarks to-day, he indicated generally his views as to the sort of bank which ought to be established. He would have a bank of a limited amount, say twenty millions of capital; he would make it indispensable that it should pay specie, by a provision that all notes not paid in specie, when properly presented, should thenceforth bear a certain interest, and by inflicting a penalty on such directors as should, during the suspension of specie payment, consent to put the notes of the bank in circulation; he was willing the Government should, if others believed it necessary, hold some stock in the bank, but at the extent not to exceed one-half of the whole amount; the remaining half to be paid in specie, or, at the discretion of the directors, in notes of existing banks, on condition that such banks should agree to resume their specie payments within a given time; and, if it was thought desirable, the Government might, he said, retain the right to subscribe hereafter an additional five millions to the capital of the bank. This was, generally, his plan. Upon the whole, he concluded by saying, although there were many points in which the present bill was preferable to the bill first reported, still, with its present amount of capital, and the great proportion of stock to specie, it was wholly objectionable in his mind, and he could not vote for it.

When Mr. W. sat down—

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, said, if he conceived any advantage to the nation could result from permitting this discussion to progress, he should not make the motion he was about to offer; but, believing, from the difference of views entertained in different parts of the House, and from the variety of plans which had been offered, that longer discussion would merely consume time, without a prospect of the final passage of the bill; and believing, also, that, by a reference to a select committee, a concurrence of the views of all parties might be obtained in favor of one plan, he moved that this bill be referred to a select committee.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, said, he was in favor of the recommitment of the bill, because he believed that, in its present form, it would not pass the House; but that a bill might be devised that would meet the views of gentlemen on all sides of the House. It was possible, at least, a combination of the views of different gentlemen might be effected, which might produce great good, and could do no harm. He was, therefore, in favor of recommitment, as the only means of effecting this desirable object.

Mr. FISK, of New York, said, he merely rose to add his wish to that of his friend from Pennsylvania. It was as certain, as anything yet in suspense could be, that the bill would not pass the House in its present shape. That it might be kept in possession of the House, and not destroyed without an effort to preserve it, he hoped the House would agree to refer it to a select committee, for such modification as might appear to be calculated to meet the views of the House. The opinions of gentlemen on all sides had been so fully expressed, that the committee, being in possession of them, would be able to mould the bill accordingly.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, said, it must be obvious, from the course of the debate, if it were not from the nature of the subject, that a great diversity of sentiment existed on this head. No question could exhibit a greater division of sentiment, confined neither to party or locality. As he was extremely anxious that the bank should be established, Mr. C. said he should be averse to throwing any obstacle in the way of the practicability of the measure, and would, therefore, heartily assent to the motion for recommitment.

The question was then taken on recommitment, and decided in the affirmative without a division; and Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. FISK of New York, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. INGHAM, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. OAKLEY, and Mr. GASTON, were appointed the committee.

TAX ON DISTILLED LIQUORS, &c.

The House then, on motion of Mr. EPPES, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the several tax bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill for laying an additional duty on distilled spirituous liquors was first taken up, and discussed with much zeal. Various amendments were made to the bill and the blanks filled, in conformity to the previous determination of the House, and to the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McLEAN moved to amend the first section so as to repeal the present tax upon the capacity, and retain the duty of twenty cents per gallon upon the product of the still.

Mr. McLEAN said the motion he had now submitted, was the same in substance as the one made on a former occasion by an honorable member (Mr. YANCEY) from North Carolina. I am aware, said he, of the extreme difficulty in adopting a system of taxation that will be equal in its operation in every part of our extended country. The situation of our citizens is so various, their pursuits so diversified, that it is impossible perfectly to equalize any general system of taxation. The diversity of circumstances and pursuits arises from local causes, confined in their nature and effects. But if we cannot arrive at entire equality, we should at least aim at it. In taxing any one article, we should guard against an imposition that would discourage the manufacture of such article. My object, in submitting this amendment, is to guard against the evil, as well resulting from the extravagance of the tax, as from the complicated system proposed.

While the resolutions submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means were under discussion, I was surprised to hear several gentlemen contend that an internal revenue, apportioned amongst the several States in proportion to their population, was the most equitable and the most conformable to the principles of our Government. Never was an argument more fallacious. The direct tax, because it is apportioned among the several States according to their population, is the most unequal tax. This inequality was sufficiently shown by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He instanced the States of New Jersey and Ohio, as being nearly equal in population; in the former, the lands are in a high state of cultivation and productive to the owners; in the latter, ninety hundredths are in a state of nature and unproductive to the owners. Nothing more can be necessary to show the unequal operation of this tax. The individual in New Jersey who owns five hundred acres of land, worth forty dollars per acre, has but little more tax to pay than the citizen in Ohio, who owns the same quantity of land, not worth more than four dollars per acre. The disproportion is here more than twelve to four.

NOVEMBER, 1814.

Tax on Distilled Liquors, &c.

H. OF R.

In every country, except where despotism has left no rights to the people, a tax on the person has ever been viewed as the most odious tax. It has ever been odious, because of its inequality, exacting as much from the poor man as the rich man. The same inequality would exist if the internal revenue were apportioned among the several States according to their population. What had been the principal basis of taxation where any regard has been had to the rights of the citizen? Property; and, in the general, that kind of property which is productive to the owner. If a revenue is derived from it by the individual, something may be yielded to the Government. I do not make these observations in opposition to the direct tax; the imposition of that tax had my hearty concurrence, and its proposed increase meets equally with my assent. But my object is, to rebut the charge that has been made against the Western representation, because they resisted the argument that it would be equal and just to impose the internal duties according to the population of the respective States, that they therefore wished to exonerate their constituents from an equal burden of taxation. I make these observations to show that it would be the extreme of injustice to exact as much from the citizen of the West, who resides in a cabin and cultivates the field with his own hands for the support of his family, as from the wealthy citizen of the Eastern and Northern States. Some gentlemen have contended this would be just, inasmuch as the States are represented in the National Legislature in proportion to their numbers. What would such an argument lead to? The poor, it would be found, would be utterly unable to pay their proportion of the burden thus imposed; the certain consequence would be, that States would be represented in proportion to their wealth, and not their population. The argument used by gentlemen could lead to no other result. This might be pleasing to a few of the wealthy, who wish influence to be attached to property, but it would subvert one of the most inestimable principles of our Government, that of equality.

In proportion to the wealth of the Western country, there is a much greater quantity of domestic spirits manufactured than in the Eastern and Northern States. Notwithstanding, the imposition of this tax would not produce much inequality, if a market could be found in the Eastern States for the spirits manufactured in the West, but the transportation is impracticable, no market is open for this article in the West; it is therefore presumable, if this additional duty to the amount proposed be imposed, that no more will be manufactured in the Western country than is necessary for home consumption. No individual can afford to pay the enormous duty, and manufacture this commodity in anticipation of a future market. I am more than willing to tax domestic spirits to the utmost extent they will bear; but I am under the most certain conviction, from the operation of the present tax on the capacity, that the additional duty proposed will rather diminish than increase the public revenue. It may not have this effect in some of the States. In New York, a market will be had for great quantities of spirit to the troops in the service of the United States who will occupy the Northern frontier. In that State, and perhaps a few others, the increased duty will yield more to the public revenue; but the principal sales being to the United States, they must necessarily pay the advanced price of the spirit; so that, although the receipts into the Treasury might be enhanced, yet the real advantage to the public revenue would be inconsiderable. The depression of the revenue in the West will equal the advance of it in other States from this source. Being willing to obtain to the public revenue the largest possible amount from this source, I would assent to a considerable addition to the present tax; I believe some addition would not depress the revenue in the West. If we can obtain the largest amount of revenue from this source, without producing an extreme pressure in any portion of the community, it is certainly most politic to do so. Gentlemen calculate on realizing an immense sum from this tax; their calculations are extravagant; they will be found illusive; they will find, when it may be too late, that they have been too anxious to fill the coffers of the Treasury from this source. Their reach has been eager, but they have grasped at a shadow that has eluded their grasp.

A gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) not now in his seat, who has taken a very active part in the imposition of this tax, stated as a fact, that distilled spirits from grain in his part of the country are worth one dollar and twenty-five cents per gallon; from this fact, he has drawn an argument in favor of the tax, and that it would operate most favorably to the Western country, as there the price of the same kind of spirit was not more than sixty-two and a half cents per gallon. What regulates the value of an article? The price it will bring in a market. If a gallon of domestic spirit will bring in Maryland one dollar and twenty-five cents, and will only sell in Ohio for sixty-two and a half cents, the tax will operate on the value of the article one hundred per cent. higher in Ohio than in Maryland; it is therefore unequal. However various my objections are to the inequality and amount of this tax, they are not less so to the manner in which it is to be imposed. A tax on the capacity and on the product of the still, will be found complicated and embarrassing. What are the evils this system is proposed to remedy? We are told it will guard against fraud; it will enable the collector to detect imposition. Sir, from this very source, I apprehend much odium will be excited against this tax and the Government. What criterion is afforded the collector to detect frauds? The most uncertain. We all know, from the ordinary concerns of life, that two men engaged in the same business, under the same advantages, will frequently produce very different results. Is it, indeed, a sufficient presumption of fraud, that one individual has not manufactured as large a quantity of spirits as his neighbor; and is this a ground on which to charge him with the commission of fraud, or to subject him to the inquisitorial powers of a collector? It ought to be on grounds more substantial, that we suspect the integrity of a citizen. In those States where taxable property has long been given in for taxation under oath, no complaints have arisen. In Ohio, a list of personal property is furnished the assessor without oath, and yet I never heard it alleged that an individual had defrauded the revenue by making an incorrect return; why, then, shall we distrust the virtue of the citizen in the collection of this tax? By this distrust we do him injustice, of which he would have a right to complain; and, while we give evidence of distrust, we afford the most uncertain means for detection. But, admitting this tax on the capacity would afford some security against fraud, is it necessary for this purpose to continue the tax? It is not probable that under the additional duty any (if any, very few) new distilleries will be erected. The tax on the capacity has been in operation the present year. All the distilleries that will be employed the ensuing year, are occupied the present year, and every means for the detection of fraud is thereby furnished to the collectors that the continuation of this tax will afford. Why, then, shall we continue it? The capacities of the distillers are known to the collectors; a tax on their capacities, therefore, cannot give any additional security to the public revenue. As this security is the only argument in favor of the continuation of the tax upon the capacity of the still, and as it must be evident that it can answer no valuable purpose, I trust it will be abandoned. Make it necessary, if any new distilleries should be erected, for the proprietor to enter the capacity of his stills with the collector under a heavy penalty.

This tax upon the capacity of the still operates the most unequally; it depresses the smaller establishments to the advantage of the larger ones. Although there is a provision in this bill somewhat favorable to the proprietor of a single still not exceeding one hundred gallons, it will be found of very little advantage. A gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGHAM,) the other day, attempted to obviate this objection of inequality, by observing that the smaller stills manufacture much more in proportion than the larger ones. If the gentleman be correct, I am utterly at a loss to assign a reason why all large establishments prefer the largest stills. But if the gentleman be in part correct, when we advert to the increased price of license for a shorter term, we will find the advantage is greatly with the large establishments, who obtain licenses for the longest term. In the price of license, if my recollection serve me, there is a difference of more than one hundred per cent. between the longest and shortest terms. Those who own small establishments, from necessity, often obtain their license for the shortest term; they have not materials, nor can they obtain them, to justify their taking license for a longer period.

There is another objection against the tax on the capacity of the still, that is well worthy of consideration. When a license is obtained, although by sickness, or a thousand contingencies, the individual may be prevented from occupying his establishment, the accident of fire, I believe, is the solitary exception which excuses him from the full payment of his bond; nor can he obtain relief by an extension of his license.

We are informed that, under the administration of Mr. Adams, the excise was odious, and that it was found necessary to change the tax from the product to the capacity of the still. Sir, it will be recollected, that the circumstances under which that tax was first imposed were extremely objectionable; the mode of its collection was still more obnoxious. When the tax was on the quantity distilled, the people were dissatisfied. When it was changed to the capacity of the still, their objections were not removed. They did not believe the situation of the country demanded the tax. But the argument, if it prove anything, proves too much; it would require us to lay the whole tax upon the capacity; this has been rejected by a large majority of this House. It appears to me, a tax upon the capacity of the still, and on the product, will subject us to the inconveniences of both systems, without any beneficial consequence resulting therefrom. I would again beg leave to repeat, that nothing is further from me than a wish to retrench, by my motion, the public revenue. I am altogether willing and anxious to obtain the utmost cent that can be obtained from this source. I believe domestic spirits is a proper object of taxation; but believing, as I do, that a more moderate addition to the present tax on the capacity would yield to the public Treasury a much larger sum; and having well-grounded apprehensions, from the operation of the present tax, that the proposed increase will rather lessen than advance the revenue in the Western country, I should act a most inconsistent part if I were not to favor a reduction of the tax. I have no fears that this or any other tax will meet with resistance in the Western country. However enormous the tax, the people of the West will submit in silence. They will find it ruinous to continue the distillation of domestic spirits; they will therefore permit their establishments to remain unoccupied without a murmur or complaint. They are sensible that the present crisis is eventful to their country; they believe sacrifices from the people are necessary; they are prepared to make them. Of this they have given evidence that is not equivocal.

Believing that it would conduce to the interest of the Government and the people to reduce the proposed tax, I cannot but hope that the motion I have submitted may obtain.

Before the bill was gone through, the House adjourned.

Several of the amendments were agreed to without debate. Other questions of amendment were debated; among which were the following:

An amendment was made in Committee of the Whole to strike out twenty cents, the amount of duty to be paid on each gallon of spirits distilled, and insert fifteen. The question on concurring in this amendment was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 78, as follows:

So the House disagreed to the amendment made in Committee.

A motion was made by Mr. WILLIAM REED to amend the bill by adding to it the following new section:

And be it further enacted, That if any of the said spirits (whereupon any of the duties imposed by this act shall have been paid or secured to be paid) shall, after the first day of January next, be exported from the United States to any foreign port or place, there shall be an allowance to the exporters thereof, by way of drawback, equal to the duties thereupon, according to the rates by this act imposed, deducting therefrom half a cent per gallon, and adding to the allowance upon spirits distilled within the United States, from molasses which shall be so exported, ten cents per gallon as an equivalent for the duty laid upon molasses; Provided always, That the said allowance shall not be made, unless the said exporter or exporters shall observe the regulations hereafter prescribed: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter the provisions in any former acts, concerning drawbacks or allowances in nature thereof.

Mr. PICKERING moved to amend the proposed amendment by striking out the words in italic, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a sum equivalent to."—Negatived.

The question on agreeing to the above proposed new section was decided in the negative. For the amendment 47, against it 99, as follows:

The bill was then further amended.

Mr. PICKERING moved to amend that part of the 25th section of the bill which pledges Congress to substitute other duties equally productive, if it shall be deemed expedient to alter, reduce, or modify these, &c., by striking out the words "other duties," and in lieu thereof inserting "other internal duties or taxes."

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, from the select committee to whom was committed the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America, reported, that the committee had had said bill under consideration, but not having been able to discover any means of uniting the conflicting opinions on the subject, had therefore directed him to report the bill without amendment. Mr. L. also laid before the House a letter obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury by the committee, on the subject of the amendments made to the bank bill.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, November 27, 1814.

SIR: The committee of the House of Representatives, to which the bank bill was recommitted on Friday last, have directed me to request you to communicate your opinion, in relation to the effect which a considerable issue of Treasury notes, (to which should be attached the quality of being receivable in subscriptions to the bank) might have upon the credit, and particularly upon the prospects of a loan for 1815. As the bill, as it was referred to the committee, provides for the subscription of forty-four millions of Treasury notes, to form, with six millions of specie, the capital of the bank; any information which you may think proper to give, either in relation to the practicability of getting them into circulation without depreciation, or in regard to their operation on any part of our fiscal system afterwards, will be very acceptable. I am, sir, &c.,

WILLIAM LOWNDES.

HON. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 27, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, requesting, for a committee of the House of Representatives, an opinion upon the following inquiries:

1. The effect which a considerable issue of Treasury notes, with the quality of being receivable in subscriptions to a National Bank, will have upon the credit of the Government; and, particularly, upon the prospects of a loan for 1815.

2. The practicability of getting forty-four millions of Treasury notes, forming, with six millions of specie, the capital for a National Bank, into circulation, without depreciation.

The inquiries of the committee cannot be satisfactorily answered, in the abstract, but must be considered in connexion with the state of our finances, and the state of the public credit.

When I arrived at Washington, the Treasury was suffering under every kind of embarrassment. The demands upon it were great in amount; while the means to satisfy them were comparatively small, precarious in the collection, and difficult in the application. The demands consisted of dividends upon old and new funded debt, of Treasury notes, and of Legislative appropriations for the Army, the Navy, and the current service; all urgent, and important. The means consisted, first, of the fragment of an authority to borrow money, when nobody was disposed to lend, and to issue Treasury notes, which none but necessitous creditors, or contractors, in distress, or commissaries, quartermasters, and navy agents, acting, as it were officially, seemed willing to accept: 2d. Of the amount of bank credits, scattered throughout the United States, and principally in the Southern and Western banks, which had been rendered, in a great degree, useless, by the stoppage of payments in specie, and the consequent impracticability of transferring the public funds from one place, to meet the public engagements in another place: 3d. Of the current supply of money from the import, from internal duties, and from the sales of public land; which ceased to be a foundation of any rational estimate, or reserve, to provide even for the dividends on the funded debt, when it was found that the Treasury notes, (only requiring, indeed, a cash payment at the distance of a year) to whomsoever they were issued at the Treasury, and almost as soon as they were issued, reached the hands of the collectors, in payment of debts, duties, and taxes; thus disappointing and defeating the only remaining expectations of productive revenue.

Under those circumstances, (which I had the honor to communicate to the Committee of Ways and Means,) it became the duty of this Department, to endeavor to remove the immediate pressure from the Treasury; to endeavor to restore the public credit; and to endeavor to provide for the expenses of the ensuing year. The only measures that occurred to my mind, for the accomplishment of such an important object, have been presented to the view of Congress. The act, authorizing the receipt of Treasury notes in payment of subscriptions to a public loan, was passed, I fear, too late to answer the purpose for which it was designed. It promises, at this time, little relief, either as an instrument to raise money, or to absorb the claims for the Treasury notes, which are daily becoming due. From this cause, and other obvious causes, the dividend on the funded debt has not been punctually paid; a large amount of Treasury notes has already been dishonored; and the hope of preventing further injury and reproach, in transacting business with the Treasury, is too visionary to afford a moment's consolation.

The actual condition of the Treasury, thus described, will serve to indicate the state of the public credit. Public credit depends, essentially, upon public opinion. The usual test of public credit is, indeed, the value of public debt. The faculty of borrowing money is not a test of public credit; for a faithless Government, like a desperate individual, has only to increase the premium, according to the exigency, in order to secure a loan. Thus, public opinion, manifested in every form and in every direction, hardly permits us, at the present juncture, to speak of the existence of public credit; and yet, it is not impossible that the Government, in the resources of its patronage and its pledges, might find the means of tempting the rich and the avaricious to supply its immediate wants. If it is now a charter of incorporation, it may then be a grant of land; but, after all, immeasurable tracts of the western wild would be exhausted in successive efforts to obtain pecuniary aids, and still leave the Government necessitous, unless the foundations of public credit were re-established, and maintained. In the measures, therefore, which it has been my duty to suggest, I have endeavored to introduce a permanent plan for reviving the public credit; of which the facility of borrowing money, in anticipation of settled and productive revenues, is only an incident, although it is an incident as durable as the plan itself. The outline seemed to embrace whatever was requisite, to leave no doubt upon the power and the disposition of Government, in relation to its pecuniary engagements, to diminish, and not to augment the amount of public debts, in the hands of individuals, and to create general confidence, rather by the manner of treating the claims of the present class of creditors, than by the manner of conciliating the favor of a new class.

With these explanatory remarks, sir, I proceed to answer, specifically, the questions which you have proposed:

1. I am of opinion, that considerable issues of Treasury notes, with the quality of being receivable in subscriptions to a National Bank, will have an injurious effect upon the credit of the Government; and, also, upon the prospects of a loan for 1815.

Because, it will confer, gratuitously, an advantage upon a class of new creditors, over the present creditors, of the Government, standing on a footing of at least equal merit.

Because, it will excite general dissatisfaction among the present holders of the public debt; and, generally, distrust among the capitalists, who are accustomed to advance their money to the Government.

Because, a quality of subscribing to the National Bank, attached to Treasury notes, exclusively, will tend to depreciate the value of all public debt, not possessing that quality; and whatever depreciates the value of the public debt in this way, must necessarily impair the public credit.

Because, the specie capital of the citizens of the United States, so far as it may be deemed applicable to investments in the public stocks, has already, in a great measure, been so vested; the holders of the present debt will be unable to become subscribers to the bank, (if that object should, eventually, prove desirable,) without selling their stock at a depreciated rate, in order to procure the whole amount of their subscriptions in Treasury notes; and a general depression in the value of the public debt will inevitably ensue.

Because, the very proposition of making a considerable issue of Treasury notes, even with the quality of being subscribed to a National Bank, can only be regarded as an experiment, on which it seems dangerous to rely; the Treasury notes must be purchased at par, with money; a new set of creditors are to be created; it may, or it may not, be deemed an object of speculation, by the money holders, to subscribe to the bank; the result of the experiment cannot be ascertained, until it will be too late to provide a remedy, in the case of failure; while the credit of the Government will be affected by every circumstance which keeps the efficacy of its fiscal operations in suspense or doubt.

Because, the prospect of a loan, for the year 1815, without the aid of a bank, is faint and unpromising; except, perhaps, so far as the pledge of a specific tax may succeed; and then, it must be recollected, that a considerable supply of money will be required for the war, beyond the whole amount of the taxes to be levied.

Because, if the loan for the year 1815 be made to depend upon the issue of Treasury notes, subscribable to the National Bank, it will probably fail, for the reasons which have already been suggested; and, if the loan be independent of that operation, a considerable issue of Treasury notes, for the purpose of creating a bank capital, must, it is believed, deprive the Government of every chance of raising money in any other manner.

2. I am of opinion, that it will be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to get forty-four millions of Treasury notes (forming, with six millions of specie, the capital of a National Bank) into circulation, with or without depreciation.

Because, if the subscription to the bank becomes an object of speculation, the Treasury notes will probably be purchased at the Treasury, and at the loan offices, and never pass into circulation at all.

Because, whatever portion of the Treasury notes might pass into circulation, would be speedily withdrawn, by the speculators in the subscription to the bank, after arts had been employed to depreciate their value.

Because, it is not believed, that, in the present state of the public credit, forty-four millions of Treasury notes, can be sent into circulation. The only difference between the Treasury notes now issued, and dishonored, and those proposed to be issued, consists in the subscribable quality; but reasons have already been assigned for an opinion, that this difference does not afford such confidence in the experiment, as seems requisite to justify a reliance upon it, for accomplishing some of the most interesting objects of the Government.

I must beg you, sir, to pardon the haste with which I have written these general answers to your inquiries. But, knowing the importance of time, and feeling a desire to avoid every appearance of contributing to the loss of a moment, I have chosen rather to rest upon the intelligence and candor of the committee, than to enter upon a more labored investigation of the subject referred to. I have the honor, &c.,

A. J. DALLAS.

the letter; which motion being objected to, was declared not to be in order at this time.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The question depending when the bill was referred to a select committee, now recurred. It was on a motion of Mr. GASTON to strike out fifty millions, (the proposed capital of the bank,) and insert twenty.

This motion was immediately decided without debate—for the motion 54, against it 85, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Cilley, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Farrow, Gaston, Geddes, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hungerford, Hulbert, Kennedy, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, McKee, Miller, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

Mr. LOWNDES then moved to amend the bill by striking out fifty and inserting thirty millions, which question was decided without debate. For the motion 77, against it 66, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Barbour, Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Burwell, Cannon, Cilley, Cox, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Desha, Earle, Ely, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Gaston, Geddes, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Hale, Hanson, Hungerford, Hulbert, Irving, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKee, McKim, Miller, Moseley, Newton, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

NAYS—Messrs. So the House determined to reduce the capital of the bank to thirty millions.

Mr. LOWNDES then suggested several amendments, to make other parts of the bill correspondent with the amendment just made; which were agreed to.

Mr. EASTON then moved an amendment to the bill, and spoke some time in support of it, the object of which was, to require the directors of the bank, at any time when one hundred thousand dollars should be subscribed and paid in, or held, by citizens of Missouri Territory, and when the same shall be required by three-fourths of such stockholders, to establish an office of discount and deposit at St. Louis in the Missouri Territory.

This motion was supported also in a cogent manner by Mr. MCKEE, of Kentucky.

It was however negatived, 27 only rising in favor of it.

Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, then moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. H. said, he was not less alive to the critical and awful condition of the country, than the Secretary of the Treasury, whose letter had been just read by the Clerk. The picture he had painted of our financial affairs was not more frightful than the reality. In some features it fell short of the original. Not only had Government bills been dishonored, and the interest of the public debt remained unpaid, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, but facts were within the knowledge of Mr. H. still more disreputable and degrading to the Administration. So completely empty was the Treasury, and destitute of credit, that funds could not be obtained to defray the current ordinary expenses of the different Departments. Disgraceful, humiliating as the fact was, it ought not to be concealed from the nation, and he felt it his duty to state to the House, that the Department of State was so bare of money as to be unable to pay even its stationery bill. The Government was subsisting upon the drainings of unchartered banks in the District, who felt themselves compelled to contribute their means, lest the rod, in terror, which was held over them, should be applied, and an act of incorporation refused. Yes, it was well known to the citizens of the District, that the Treasury was obliged to borrow pitiful sums, which it would disgrace a merchant in tolerable credit to ask for.

Mr. H. mentioned the instance of an acceptance of $3,500, which the War Department was unable to pay, and persuaded a bank in Georgetown to pay for them. He mentioned several acceptances, which he himself had seen, for large amounts, which had been protested by the public notary. The Paymaster was unable to meet demands for paltry amounts—not even for $30, which was a well established fact. He spoke also of the failure to meet the public engagements at New York and Philadelphia. He said he was apprized, several days in advance, of the explosion which happened in the latter place, and had attempted to take the floor several days past, to prepare the House for the event, but he had not been so fortunate as to catch the Speaker's eye. In short, it was difficult to conceive a situation more critical and perilous, than that of the Government at this moment, without money, without credit, and destitute of the means of defending the country.

Under such circumstances, I agree, said Mr. H., with the Secretary of the Treasury, that not a moment should be lost in exerting the Constitutional power of Congress to its utmost energy, to check, or turn aside this evil current of events, which threatens to overwhelm the nation. Not a moment was to be lost in preventing, if possible, further mischief, and in repairing what was already done. But if an opinion was to be formed of the future, from the past proceedings of the House, there was little ground for hope. Congress was in the third month of its session; it had been convened under circumstances appealing to whatever of spirit and patriotism there was in the country, addressing themselves with peculiar force to the authors of our calamities—the party in power. What had been done towards discharging the interesting and sacred trust reposed in the representatives of the people—the guardians of the national honor and safety? The House was daily involved in useless wrangling debates, which from all appearance were likely to result in nothing but words, and abortive attempts at action. While the doctors are disputing, said Mr. H., about the medicines to be administered, the patient is rapidly approaching to its last breath. It cannot be said of me, sir, that I have thrown obstructions in the way of the ruling party. So far from it, I have abstained purposely from taking part in many interesting debates, in the hope that action would be substituted for words, and from an unwillingness to consume time, every moment of which I deemed precious to the country. Such is my ardent desire to economise time, as far as is consistent with intelligent legislation, that I would not now claim the attention of the House, but that my patience is exhausted. I have waited, and in vain, to see this pernicious measure consigned to the fate which evidently awaits it, and to see some other feasible plan, which the discretion and good sense of the House can sanction, introduced in its place. I can remain silent no longer. Its palpable deformity, its utter inadequacy to the ends proposed, and its destructive tendency, seem to be apparent to a large majority of the House, who are impatient to despatch it. A scheme so absurd and visionary, could have been looked for from no other quarter than that which produced it; and I am glad to see that gentlemen on the other side of the House have at last collected the courage, and manifested their determination to pursue what they call an ignis fatuus (Mr. CALHOUN) no further. An ignis fatuus, truly, sir, and which, like other jack-o'-lanterns, engendered in the fens of party, will play about the surface of those stagnated pools until it sinks, and is extinguished. It was this same bold and false prophet who led us into Canada, to conquer free trade and sailors' rights; and such is the sanguine nature of the late chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, that I have not a doubt, even now, he would contract, if he could find security for the forfeiture, to capture, in six weeks, more or less, the whole British army, and deliver them, bound hand and foot, at the Capitol.

The SPEAKER called to order, conceiving the remarks to be personal.

Mr. HANSON said, that hitherto he had with pleasure paid the most scrupulous regard to the judgment of the Chair, and bowed cheerfully to its decisions, but on this occasion he must be allowed to suggest that the latitude usually indulged in such discussions was favorable to the course now taken in debate. Besides, the honorable Speaker would recollect, upon this very question, the liberty contended for had been enjoyed by the other side of the House in a degree and mode not now proposed to be transcended.

The SPEAKER said his anxiety to exclude every thing like personality from debate, and a conviction that the rule of the House supported his opinion, were sufficient reasons for his adhering to his decision. And it was due to the gentleman from Maryland to say, that he had always paid that respect to the Chair, which was so necessary in supporting its dignity, and that of the House.

Mr. HANSON acquiesced. He knew of nothing more visionary than the idea of the gentleman from South Carolina, that, in the present depreciated state of the public credit and finances, the enormous sum of forty-four millions of Treasury notes could be put in circulation. A scheme of a paper medium so stupendous, at a time so critical, destroyed every hope of extricating the country. If sanctioned by the House, so far from relieving the nation, it would plunge it into still deeper difficulties. He looked with horror and dismay at the project, and was most of all astonished that the House treated it with the respect of entertaining it one day in debate.

Sir, said Mr. H., my opposition to this gigantic, ricketty, deformed project, cannot be ascribed to a sinister design to embarrass the Government, and prevent the relief necessary to be afforded, and speedily to be afforded, to its finances. I know, sir, the country cannot be defended, it will be out of the power of the Government to save it, if they are so disposed, unless the Treasury is relieved. My opposition to the bill proceeds from my extreme anxiety, to place it in the power of those who direct the Government, to defend and save the country. I will permit no man in this nation to take precedence of me, in straining every nerve, and stretching the Constitution to the utmost limit of liberal interpretation, to impart the power requisite to defend the country, and maintain its rights of sovereignty and soil; but I will embark in no rash and desperate measures, which will put everything at hazard, and entail unnumbered woes upon posterity. "Desperate situations produce desperate councils and desperate measures!" But it is in such times that men of virtue, reflection, and wisdom, are especially called on to look with dispassionate calmness on the state of affairs, and to oppose with firmness all expedients which are calculated to increase, instead of diminishing the evils to be remedied. At a period like the present, when "men are as much blinded by the extremes of misery," as, in times past, they have been intoxicated with the extreme of prosperity, the corrective of sober judgment and wholesome inquiry is more necessary to prevent irremediable mischief than to guard against probable reverses. It has been said that "great distress never has hitherto taught, and, while the world lasts, never will teach lessons of wisdom to mankind." But, if wisdom in our councils cannot be assured by past calamities, we may at least avoid a pitfall which is visible to the dullest vision.

I say again, and again, sir, my undisguised, avowed object is, to defend the country, and, if it be not too late, under Providence, to preserve it by prompt, and wise, and vigorous Constitutional measures. I am not ignorant that the first and indispensable step towards defending the country, is the recovery of public credit, and the disembarassment of the finances. But I do fear, without a united effort in this House and throughout this nation to restore confidence in the Treasury, every attempt to reinstate the finances will prove abortive. I entertain the opinion, formed after much reflection and a free interchange of sentiment with enlightened men, that, unless a general and generous effort is made by all parties to revive the expiring credit of the Treasury, it will continue to languish, daily to depreciate, until I would say the credit of Jacob Barker himself, if it were not attaching more importance to him than he merits, will be high, compared with that of the Government, in the money market. Under this strong conviction, and knowing, as every man in the nation must know, that the country cannot be defended without the ways and means, and, as far as depends on me, being resolved at every hazard and extremity consistently with civil liberty and the Constitution, to preserve, unimpaired, the rights and honor of the nation, I therefore shall co-operate in all measures to defend the country. This can only be done by reproducing and bracing the main sinew of war—money, public credit—without which, the nation will be delivered up, bound hand and foot, to the enemy, unless rescued by the energy of the respective State sovereignties. When things come to the worst, the States can and will defend themselves, I have no doubt; but my object is to defend the country under the Constitution, and to prevent a dissolution of the Union, which is inevitable, if the means are not provided to enable the General Government to defend the States. If the means are supplied, and they are still misapplied and wasted in fruitless attempts at conquest, the States must, of necessity, take their defence into their own hands. But the condition of the country is so critical, I see no choice but to take the chance of a correct application of means to be placed at the disposal of the Government. The charge never shall be brought against me, that I folded my arms and looked on an indifferent spectator, while the country was sinking. The men in power shall never be able to throw upon me any portion of the blame of not extricating the country from the difficulties into which their incompetency and folly have plunged it. It will be demanded of them to return the Government pure and undefiled, as they received it. Degrading terms of peace I will never agree to; and if our rights and honor are to be sacrificed, they shall never have it to say they were so sacrificed, because I, as one of the minority, withheld from them the means of preserving them. No; they shall have the means, as far as I can give them. I will bear my portion of the odium of their measures for defence, where they do not trench upon the Constitution. When they do so trench; when their measures go to prostrate civil liberty, and overthrow the Constitution, I will resist them, and recommend resistance to the people. I will draw the sword to put down and punish usurpation and tyranny at home, with the same alacrity that I would rush to the water's edge, to repel the invading foe. I now fear nothing from usurpation, because we are now free and able to resist it successfully. The attempt will prove that both the physical and numerical strength of the country lies where it ought to lie, because it will never be exerted except in defence of the country and the liberties of the people. Subjugation by a foreign Power can hardly be deemed an evil, compared with domestic despotism and slavery. The foreign yoke may be broken and thrown off, but the chains rivetted upon a people by their own tyrants, are difficult to be loosened and destroyed. It will be unavailing, and worse than unavailing, to put the country in a posture to meet the enemy without, if a more dangerous enemy within is permitted quietly, and at his leisure, to reduce this people to a state of ignominious bondage.

In coming to the determination to grant the supplies asked for to defend the country, I maintain I am neither inconsistent with myself, faithless to my friends, nor false to my country. The highest temporal obligations, according to my moral sense, and the soundest policy, according to my judgment, approve the course I have marked out for myself. The reason is obvious why I shall abstain from a particular discussion of the points of difference between me and some of my political friends. Either being wrong, I know it is for me to wait the award of an enlightened and virtuous community, having no other palliation to offer, than that, if I have erred, it is my firm conviction I have erred on the side of the best interests of my country. We, no doubt, aim at the same goal, but choose different routes to arrive at it. I am perfectly sure that we all prefer our country to ourselves, its good to our own gratification. That my political friends, in common with me, have a single eye to the safety and lasting happiness of the nation, cannot be doubted. We are alike anxious, and resolved, if possible, though we may differ in some respects about the means, to save the country. When I say country, I, of course, do not mean those fell destroyers of its rights, peace, safety, and honor, whose misdeeds have brought upon the people the suffering under which they smart, the burdens which force from them deep groans which are heard throughout the land. No man feels a more thorough sovereign contempt for the wicked authors of our afflictions than I do; and if it is said, in contributing to the relief and salvation of the country, I incidentally relieve them, I justify, by replying, even such men must be relieved in preference to certain national bankruptcy, and the overthrow of the freest form of Government known on the globe. Let the tempest-beaten vessel of State be first brought into port, I will then join gentlemen in throwing the treacherous pilot overboard. Now is not the time to put all at hazard by rash and untried acts of violence. The ship is sinking, I will give a hand to the pump. The temple is in flames, I will hand a bucket.

Such is the perilous situation of the country, visible to every eye, and plain to every understanding, that unless a combined effort is made to rescue us from the dangers which are seen on all sides, I do fear our case is desperate, our ruin irretrievable, that we are lost irrecoverably. But, sir, while there is yet life there is still hope. I will not, must not, dare not, abandon the country. If deserted by its true friends now, it will sink so low, that it cannot hereafter, under the guidance of other councils, be re-elevated to that pinnacle of honor, dignity, and glory, from which it has been dashed by heartless and corrupt men in their despicable contests for personal aggrandizement. If the country, two years hence, is to be governed by wiser and abler men, I see no reason to conceal the opinion that the sooner a good and sufficient system of revenue and a well regulated bank are organized the better. They will be necessary instruments for those who may succeed the authors of the burdens, which must constitute the basis of a system imparting efficiency and ability to the national finances. If we can save the vessel of State from being wholly wrecked, the easier it will be to repair and rig her out again. But most certain it is, if our affairs are suffered to go on in their present downward course, a few months hence, I might point to the naked, crumbling columns of your Capitol as a type or symbol of the Government.

Let, then, a united effort be made to save the country. But, at the same time, be it understood that we are not to withdraw our opposition to those unconstitutional measures, and that pernicious policy of Government, which are adopted with no other view than that the party in power may be more firmly seated in power, and the better enabled to persevere in their mischievous career. This we cannot do, without abandoning our most sacred duties, without a base dereliction of those well tried principles which have stood every test and passed through every ordeal for a long series of years. No, sir, we cannot be expected to add fuel to the flame by which we ourselves are consumed; to feed the fever which is raging in our veins; to become the architects of our own ruin; to assist in forging chains for posterity, if not for ourselves.

I confess, sir, I have the less difficulty in voting supplies, and uniting to recover public credit, since the disclosures made to the House by the President in relation to the discussions at Ghent. Anterior to that communication, the resolution had been formed, as far as I might be supposed to be entitled to political consideration, to join in measures for defence. Although I believed the war was unjust and wicked in its origin, yet a state of things had arisen out of the revolution in Europe, the threats of devastation by the enemy, and his increased ability to execute his menaces, which rendered it necessary to unite in objects of defence, and to strengthen the arm of Government for that purpose. Although declared, the war is not now continued from motives and designs foreign to this people. On the contrary, the Administration has humbled itself, to a degree exciting commiseration, to obtain peace. Without violating "the injunction of secrecy," which locks up from the eye of the people the most interesting part of the despatches, I will advert merely to such parts as are public. I say, then, I have the less difficulty in voting supplies, because the Administration has changed its ground since the revolution in Europe, and come over to my opinion and views of the fair terms of peace. As the contest now stands the question of blockade no longer presents difficulties. That of impressment, ay, of impressment, is abandoned by the very authors themselves of the cabalistic words "free trade and sailors' rights!" The Napoleon notion of floating colonies is also discarded, since its author has himself been consigned to a state of colonial dependence, being struck from the list of continental potentates, though he preserves all the forms of royalty in his little kingdom, not so large as the possessions of some of our Southern dons, with their thousands of acres and battalions of blacks. The question of "free ships, free goods," is also put at rest. The right of visit and search is impliedly conceded, and the flag is not to cover the crew. It is not three months, sir, since I myself saw "free trade and sailors' rights," floating in proud defiance on your flag at the battery of the White-House. The mystic words were written on the star spangled banner, which our naval heroes carried into the very British Channel, where it waved in triumph. But, alas! your Hulls, Decatur's, Perrys, and McDonoughs, now know that the President is content to waive the question of sailors' rights, and to give the go-by to that of "the flag's covering the crew." They now know from what sources and what motives proceeded all the delusive, senseless uproar about sailors' rights, by the very men who have struggled in times past to degrade our Navy, and, in their own words, "would have gone further to see it consumed by fire than to extinguish the flames." Yes, sir, these heroes may now ask, for what have we fought glorious battles, achieved brilliant victories, spilt our blood, plucked the brightest gem from the British diadem, when cowardice "had torn down the flag which valor had nailed to the mast."

I may be complained of, sir, for these digressions, but, if we are to trace our difficulties to their source, we must mount higher than to this or that particular error and act of folly, which has characterized the vicious system of politics so long persevered in, to the disgrace and ruin of the country. The root of the evil is not this or that blunder, that or the other piece of deception and mischief, but it is the political system of Administration, not only in relation to the finances, but to the general policy of the Government. It has been tried, fatally tested, and has led, and can lead to nothing but disappointment, suffering, and disgrace. Let it, then, be abandoned at once and for ever, or all efforts to preserve the country will have but a temporary effect, and be productive only of increased difficulties hereafter.

Mr. Speaker, it once was the pride and happiness of the country—and I bring back the recollections of gentlemen to the period, with bitter feelings of regret—to flourish under the benign influence of a political system, which experience proved to be conducive to our fame and welfare. Preferring the people's good to the people's favor, the party now in the minority introduced and faithfully adhered to that system, which raised the nation to an unexampled state of prosperity and happiness. Its results are now matter of history. Unfortunately for the country, it was misunderstood, systematically misrepresented and decried by the demagogues of the day, and finally rejected by a majority of the people. Yes, sir, a false and erroneous understanding of it was imposed upon the minds of the deluded people, and it was discarded, because they knew not its value. Even after we were denied by the people, it continued our chief care—the principal object of our ambition—the sole motive to exertion—to preserve to the country what had been already gained. We betrayed no unwillingness that our successors should reap the glory and benefit of our institutions, provided, only, that they were preserved to the country. When, at the last, the infuriate passion of party, and the unrelenting spirit of persecution, succeeded in overthrowing and sweeping away most of those institutions, we should still have been content, if the great objects for which they were designed—the peace, honor, and safety of the country—could have been preserved. They have all been destroyed, and covered up in the same grave. Gentlemen now feel and acknowledge the loss of one of those noble institutions—the National Bank—and they would recall it, to relieve them from difficulties which cause distress and dismay throughout the land. That cannot be; it is too late; the dead cannot be restored to life. To use the language of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,)
